Note that this flagrant act was discovered by the merest accident. The fact that it occurred in the very home town of my opponent, as well as that of our governor and congressman, makes me wonder how many ballots were "borrowed," altered and then successfully returned, in less conspicuous communities.

Let's consider just two more typical incidents, before we move on to the next chapter. The official count in one Logan County precinct was Kilgore 201, Sweeney 2, though the people afterward swore they had voted for me. In another Logan precinct, one of my representatives found that all pollbook signatures looked as if they were signed by the same hand. According to his affidavit, he asked the county court, sitting as a board of canvassers, to throw out the returns from the precinct. The court refused. He asked it to summon the precinct officials to explain the similarity of the signatures. The court refused.

Are you beginning to grasp the fundamental significance of stolen votes in American public life? They are both the seeds and the armor of crooked political machines. They help to put the wrong men in office, the wrong judges, the wrong congressmen, the wrong ators. And they help to keep them there. y corrupt men who are otherwise honest, who have not the nerve to break through ring of ballot thievery, because they fear re may be ballot thieves in their own ks.

nd remember that even the citizen who ens smilingly to a boastful tale of how the es of some ward were manipulated is also tly guilty. She—or he—is helping mold the ction morality of her community.

There are not many in political life who ve the nerve to speak as Senator Tobey, of w Hampshire, did when an election-inves- ating committee to which he belonged med to be treading too softly.

"It is the duty of this committee," he said, 'o let the chips fall where they will and turn t spotlight of publicity fully on all violators, gardless of their standing in the communi- s or their party affiliations. The commit- should assert its right to delve deeply."

Senator Tobey stated on the open floor at, in his presence, a brother senator had t his head in his arms and wept at the pres- e that was put on him to back away from investigation of the Hague machine. He ther reported that Hague himself had reatened to go to Washington "and tell the mmittee what should be done."

We had some pressure in West Virginia, o, on the Federal agents who went there to k into charges of wrongdoing. I've already d you my story was typical of its kind.

Let me make one thing clear. The fact that ud was practiced on behalf of a candidate not the slightest proof that he knew what nt on. I'm not afraid to acknowledge that ere may have been dis- nest ballots cast for me r for selected local can- dates, with Sweeney tes as a by-product). But don't want that kind of lp and I don't intend to t a finger to protect anyone who violated e right of franchise.

I don't believe that President Truman er wanted dishonest ballots cast for him ther. Yet the fact remains that he was lifted to the United States Senate by the ballots the Pendergast machine. The Federal at- rney whom President Roosevelt chose to ean up Kansas City says there were 40,000 60,000 phony registrations in Pendergast's nds the year Judge Truman won the Sen- e nomination by 41,000.

The names weren't there because Mr. Tru- an or any other national figure wanted em there. They were there because a sinis- r local organization wanted them to pro- ote and protect its own sinister interests.

They'll continue to be there, or some simi- r place, until our better citizens learn as uch about democracy at the bottom as they o about democracy at the top. I'll wager hat of every dozen ladies reading this article, here are eleven who can expound the charter f the United Nations to every one who can utline the election law of her own state.

WELL, what can we do about it all? That question has three answers:

1. Things to do before next Election Day.
2. Things to do after Election Day in the tates.
3. Things to do after Election Day in Wash- ngton.

1. Of course we can't change the laws be- tween now and November 2. But we can take steps to see that present laws are more hon- estly enforced. How? By urging newspapers to send reporters and photographers to ques- tionable precincts. By organizing our neigh- bors to do their own checking of registration lists. By finding out in advance who election officials are, and protesting the appointment of the unqualified. By letting the public know that honest folks, both Republican and Dem- ocratic, are determined to have an honest ballot and will collect evidence, affidavits, pictures, and so on, of dishonest behavior. By making every possible use of every cam- era we can lay our hands on, movie or other- wise. A picture of the $3 line-up outside a polling place, for instance, would be worth a dozen affidavits.

It's obvious that you'll have to get the help of your husbands, brothers and sons. Show them this article, particularly the young fel- lows, the combat veterans. They'll get the idea. They'll appreciate that if it's worth four years of facing death to protect the free bal- lot, it's also worth a few hours of work on Election Day.

NOW, how about 2? First thing is to start looking over your state election laws, with a view to improving them. It's impossible to state here specifically what a good law should contain, but you can't go wrong if you build it on these fundamental principles:

a. A responsible ballot, which makes the elector check off every person he wants to vote for, and abolishes the practice of voting a straight ticket with a single X.

b. Absolute daylight, all year round, on reg- istration lists, with provision for periodic cleanouts of the dead and departed, and wide- spread publication of lists so you can tell if some impostor says he lives in your house, or the lot up the street.

c. Staffing of local election boards on the merit system, with training for offi- cials through manuals, movie shorts, and so on.

d. Fewer city polling places, in better loca- tions, preferably school buildings exclusively. No more basements. No more back rooms in saloons.

e. Fewer officials, with more individual re- sponsibility, so you can pin down those who break the law and prevent the buck passing that goes on now.

f. Stricter penalties and longer jail sen- tences for violators, with double punishment for offenses by those sworn to uphold the law.

Too little or too much spoils everything. —DUTCH PROVERB.

g. Voting machines as fast as you can afford them (although I am aware that the best machine is no match for a crooked clerk), and until then central counting headquarters where sealed ballot boxes must be brought immediately after polls close. Such headquarters to provide for citizens, reporters and photographers, who want to watch the count, make pictures of challenged ballots, registration lists, and so on.

3. a. A few more words in the rather confin- ing Federal law, which is the only means Uncle Sam now has for intervening in a Fed- eral election. At present he can punish only those who "injure, oppress, threaten or in- timidate any citizen" who is trying to vote in a Federal election. He should be able to act in case of fraud too.

b. More heat on the congressmen and sena- tors who look the other way when election scandals are mentioned, and faster action when candidates for Federal office complain of jobbery.

Does this sound like a catalogue of impos- sibility? Is the cause of clean elections a dream to be sighed over on lecture platforms, while the boys in the back room continue to guffaw?

Well, let's see. What country, by general consent, conducts her balloting with almost a total absence of scandal? It's England, isn't it? But was she always that way? Here's what Frederic Austin Ogg says in English Govern- ment and Politics:

"Within the memory of men still living, British parliamentary elections were, speak- ing generally, shameless affairs. . . . Voting was by show of hands at a public meeting of electors. . . . Rivers of beer were set flow- ing; bribes were openly offered and accepted; organized bands of 'bludgeon men' went about intimidating and coercing electors; nonvoters thrust themselves joyously into the fray; political convictions were expressed in terms of rotten apples and dead cats' heads and a generally riotous time was had by all."

England cleaned that up almost overnight. Can't we get rid of our mess too?

Remember this. When we do wield a new broom in the ballot box, we open the way for better men and better measures, from the school board to the White House.

got you in the gam instead of the mush, isn't it?" After that, he rather imagined, he'd never feel touchy about it again.

They rumbaed, Polly's head bobbing close under his chin. He was holding her altogether too tightly for a rumba. If Polly noticed, she didn't seem to care. She hummed the Spanish words to herself, occasionally spinning back and around in a deft little improvisation of her own. Her chief attention she gave to the rhythm. He liked that. A girl should dance when she danced, not beat her gums.

So only love was missing, and even that might come too. And if it was Polly, that might be the best thing that ever happened to him. She wasn't beautiful by a long shot, she wasn't even pretty if it came to that; but she had those shoulders, and when she smiled you felt just as warm and delighted as Polly looked. But Ted was in no hurry to commit himself. Reflecting this, he checked himself and held her less tightly. It was then, over her head, that he saw Carol Ames.

He said, "Who's that girl with the gray-haired gent? They're standing at the bar."

"Where? Oh. Why, that's Carol Ames." There was a curious note in Polly's voice.

He glanced down at her, amused; was she jealous? "Very attractive," Ted observed.

"Very. Would you like to meet her?"

She stepped back, took his hand and drew him along to the bar. He saw Carol Ames look around and recognize Polly. Then their own gaze met over Polly's head. At once he suspected this girl was going to matter.

"Hello, Carol—hello, Mr. Ames!" exclaimed Polly. "This is our house guest, Ted Charteris, from New York. Ted's opening the new Martin-Folke agency here. You need a new car, don't you, Mr. Ames?"

"Sounds to me," said Mr. Ames, extending his hand to Ted, "like you're the one who's going into business, Polly."

"Just a little helper. Carol, this is Ted."

"Matter of fact," said Mr. Ames, "Carol's the one who needs a car. She hasn't considered a Martin-Folke, though."

"Oh, a marvelous car," Polly said. "Does everything but give milk, and they're working on that. Go on and dance, you two—sell her on it, Ted."

Ted touched Carol Ames' arm, and they moved out on the floor.

THE first few measures they took in silence. She danced magnificently, just the height he liked best, taller than Polly. He was reflecting how nice it was, too, that she shared Polly's instinct about not talking on a dance floor, when she spoke.

She said in a rather flat voice, "Well? How do you like Arden?"

"Wonderful," Ted replied, missing a beat. He added, achieving the rhythm again, "More and more all the time."

She chose not to take this personally, though he had said it looking straight at her. Her dark, cool gaze remained fixed over his shoulder. "They get so drunk," she said.

Ted laughed tolerantly. "Well, it's Satu day night. Don't you relax on Saturd night?"

"To put on paper hats," said Carol Am "and drink as much bourbon as possible not my idea of relaxation."

HE felt chastened, but to his surprise rat liked it. The rumba shifted to a fox trot. Th they had a little trouble. Ted cursed his l and set his teeth, simultaneously comman ing himself not to try so hard. As he stumble a second time, she gave him an oblique loo he gathered she thought he must be hig

"It's not bourbon," he explained, "an it's not you. It's my bum leg. A rumba can take in my stride, but something about fox trot ——"

"Oh, I'm sorry," she murmured. At onc she stepped back from him, just not lookin down at his leg. "Actually, I'd like some ai Do you mind going out on the veranda?"

The veranda wa uninhabited. It wa too early for neckers too cold for anythin else. They moved ove to the balustrade an stood gazing out a the golf course. Th landscape was vivid moonlight lay lik frost on every blad of grass.

"Won't you b cold?"

"No. Anyhow, I like being cold."

In more ways tha one, guessed Te shrewdly. Then h was ravished by h loveliness again. She had the incredible skin and profile of an authentic beauty, th grooming achieved more often by a model than by a debutante. In New York she would be famous, whatever her background. What was she doing here?

"What do you do?" he asked presently. "I mean, I was wondering if ——"

But she understood. She declared, "I vegetate mostly." She looked his way, her eyes focusing abstractedly on his chin, and smiled. It struck him that since they'd first seen each other—over Polly Morrison's head—this girl hadn't once met his eyes. This, of course, both excited and annoyed him. The technique of a femme fatale—except that this girl was too cold, too genuinely detached from everything to be exercising technique. Other girls had tried being world-weary with Ted. It was funny that the only one who'd done it with conviction was this product of a Midwestern town. Miss Ames, in fact, was deeply, honestly bored. He hadn't a doubt of it.

"A person can vegetate," he was driven to say, "anywhere in the world, you know."

"Can he?" She looked out at the frosty landscape again. "Not quite so successfully as here, I expect. Wait a little. You'll see."

He said abruptly—or perhaps just rudely, remembering how he liked the town—"Why don't you go away, then?"

She continued vaguely to smile. "Because it's my home. And because, among other things, I'm lazy."

He insisted, "That's just cynical. What's wrong with the town?"

She looked at him. For the second time their eyes really met. He again experienced

Sonnet

And should we never come this way again
To walk the old, old trails we used to follow,
Nor scuff dead leaves in autumn when the rain
Impregnates creeks which swirl down gorge and hollow;
Or take, in fall, the long and lost trail back Down starlit valleys where the foxes bark,
To come upon this lonesome mountain shack
Where foxgloves glow like candles in the dark—
Remember, conscious we may not return,
How gourds and squaw corn color sunken porches,
And how, through rain, the sputtering sumacs burn
Along these hills like ragged, windy torches—
And these few days when earth was almost heaven
When we knew love such as was never given.

that fleeting, fated sort of feeling. "Oh, nothing." She added calmly but with emphasis, "You'll like it."

Then she turned and moved back across the veranda. He followed her, aware that for some reason his limp was exaggerating itself. He felt snubbed, he felt like a country cousin who has been smiled at for gushing over the big city. He thought, She could be twice as beautiful, and I still wouldn't like her. On the other hand—and he knew this very well—he had never been so physically attracted to a woman in his life.

The apartment Ted chose, in a new development near the country club, cost just a little more than he could afford. It was foolish, perhaps, but then everything was going so well. Even though there was an indeterminable time of waiting between selling a car and being able to deliver it, every signed order meant that he, instead of some other agent, would eventually collect the profit. And he was getting all those orders that a new agency had any reason to hope for—and perhaps a few more. This was due less to his sales ability than to the connections of the Morrison family. His mother and Polly's had been roommates at college; nothing seemed too much for the Morrisons to do for him. This, of course, made him more anxious than ever to succeed on his own.

He felt especially cheerful when he accomplished a sale without a tip from Polly's father. One afternoon when he had driven to the neighboring town of Lancing and brought back a signed contract, he telephoned Polly back in Arden. A celebration was in order, he told her. She would please meet him at his apartment at six, and she would kindly wear her most spectacular dress, and they would drive out to that fancy new roadhouse for dinner. Polly thought this would be a marvelous idea and said so. He hung up, feeling a glow of content which thought of seeing Polly reinforced. Then he started back to Arden.

It was a heavenly afternoon. The countryside, thawing under the May sun, was pungent with new fragrances. Sticky little buds hazed the limbs of maple trees; birds sang, the road occasionally crossed a brook, and Ted knew that the wisest thing he had ever done was to come here.

APPROACHING Arden, he passed the estate which a customer last week had pointed out as the Ames property. He thought of Carol Ames, and for a moment he wished it were she he was meeting for dinner tonight. But only for a moment: he could easily have seen her again during the past weeks. Her father had said she was interested in a new car, and this provided an opening. But for some reason, Ted hadn't taken advantage of it. Reflecting on this, he congratulated himself.

As he approached a curve where brush had piled up and obscured the highway, he put his hand in his pocket for a cigarette. At the same time, a girl on a bay horse came riding from the brush and started across the road. There was no danger. In trying to draw over, however, Ted's arm pressed against the horn. He immediately took his foot off the gas. The horse stood rigid an instant, then shied sideways. His hoofs skidded on the pavement, he plunged and turned about, and before the girl astride could pull him down, he reared so violently she was thrown to the road. Then the bay went bolting up the highway.

Ted threw on the brake. He thrust open the door and flung himself out into the weeds along the road. As he ran forward, the jodhpurs sat up, rubbing her arms as ing a blinded look on him. She looke beautiful, at this moment, then he co imagined even she could be.

"Miss Ames!"

Ted said, "Well, I'm not eating roo berries." Then he added with an aggre ness he neglected to temper, "On the hand, with deliveries the way they are. I make in a week, sometimes, couldn for that pair of pants you've got on."

WITH THE CHILDREN

As the children were leaving home to attend a birthday party I reminded them to say "Thank you; I had a nice time." Our daughter quickly replied that she would. Our young son said, "I'll say thank you, but I won't say I had a nice time unless I really do. Do you want me to be a little liar?"

"It's the kind of a house you stand up in but you don't feel like sitting down in."

"Is it raining?"

"No, it's just drooling," the five-year-old answered.

"He told me he has to be naughty because everyone expects him to be and everyone is so surprised when he's good they talk about it too long."

"Do you know what you do?" he said challengingly. "You irritate me."

He at once felt better. He brooded at her, balancing his chin on his fourth pony of brandy. About halfway through the second one, it had begun to rankle that he'd felt so concerned about this girl. It seemed outrageous before this polar calm, to think he'd trembled and turned pale and got in all that tizzy because she might be hurt. Now, on the fourth, he thought belligerently, On her, a broken arm would look good.

"Perhaps you had better go," agreed Carol Ames.

"Another thing about you: you could go practically anywhere in the world—the Colony in New York, the Crillon in Paris—and you'd have men wondering how they could get to know you and women wondering where you got your clothes. And that's amazing. Especially the part about the clothes. Considering you're out of a hick town."

She set her tea deliberately on the floor. "Aren't those brandies," she inquired, "making you rather drunk, Mr. Charteris?"

It had been amusing when Polly Morrison asked him that. This girl made him feel boorish. But he was too clever to let her guess this. That's why it startled him so to hear himself blurt out, "That's not all they're making me."

"Indeed?"

"They're making me want to make love to you."

She stood up, one hand on her stock, the other holding on to the setter's collar. "You know, I've never asked Donald to throw anyone out. But I'm going to, presently."

"That old man who brought your tea?" Ted laughed scornfully. "Ha!" He stood up, too, with a dignity and composure that made any idea of his being influenced by the brandy ridiculous. "My dear Miss Ames," he said distinctly, "I'm perfectly ready to leave." He strolled to the door, then looked back at her. His smile, he felt, was a masterpiece of sarcasm. "And that wasn't a compliment, saying that I wanted to make love to you."

Her eyes were fixed on his feet. "I hardly considered it one."

He laughed eloquently. "Good-by!" was his parting shot, and he turned to go.

But her voice came drifting aft "You can leave that glass on the ha if you don't mind."

It was true: the brandy glass wa his hand. Undaunted, Ted set it o the hall table and let himself out, sl the door in a well-bred way.

But fifteen minutes later, drivi Arden with the chill of the evening a ing over his face. Ted muttered, "O He pulled up to a curb, flung on the and pressed his forehead down aga wheel. "Two dozen—no, three dozen of th low roses! And another five bucks, if you'll take them out to the Ames before you go back to your dinner."

When this was settled, Ted climbe in his car and sat there, feeling the drip down his sides. But there was n else to be done. The question was could he? What had got into him? H ing the girl off her horse and then swill her old man's brandy and gratuitou sulting her. If she told Mr. Ames, this town were a little farther South— deserved to be lynched. Would roses, the note enclosed with them affect all? Ted closed his eyes and sank do neath the wheel, clenching his han gether.

It was then he thought of Polly. nized, he shot up again and looked watch. It was almost eight.

saw, was empty. She had been there, however: the lamps were on. He groaned conclusively, flinging his hat in a corner.

Then the door to the dining room opened. Polly came in. She wasn't wearing the spectacular dress he'd ordered; she wore slacks and an apron. On a platter in her hands she bore the charred corpse of what seemed a small bird. She said "Look!" and thrust it out at him.

Ted stared at the cinders. "What is it?"

"Our dinner. I never stopped to think you might be held up." She swallowed tragically. "Oh, Ted," she said, "it was going to be the loveliest dinner!" Then she burst into tears

Suddenly Ted felt very tired. He felt comforted, too, in a morbid sort of way: it was cheering to see someone else give way. He took the platter from Polly's hands and set it on a table. Then he moved back to her and put his hands on her elbows.

"Polly, for heaven's sake, it doesn't matter. You think you've got troubles." He sighed and tried again. "Listen, we'll go back to your house, and you can change, and then we'll drive out to The Dells for dinner. Please, darling."

She drew in her breath and stopped crying. She looked up at him incredulously. He knew what the incredulity was for; that "darling" still echoed. But it had come out with such naturalness. He cleared his throat. Before he could speak, however, Polly threw her arms about his neck and kissed him. He stood there limply, thinking, How confused can things be? There was something about that kiss.

There was something, as a matter of fact, about Polly. She had no dark, cool gaze, no particular way of speaking or just not looking at you. There was nothing mysterious, nothing especially provocative about her. But he realized something that had been in the back of his mind for a number of days now. He had been, for the past week or so, very near to falling in love with her. On the other hand, there was Carol Ames.

Ted suspected the extent of this reservation when he looked up from his desk the next afternoon and saw a woman enter the showroom. Her face was obscured by a hat with a feather, but that didn't matter. He sat very still, hoping she wouldn't see him for a second.

There was never anything so flawlessly executed. She wore a suit of some gray material and a loop of small animal skins which trailed softly from one shoulder. Everything about her was soft, so that she seemed to move in a haze, the outlines of herself delicately obscured. But that profile was sharp as a stencil as she paused to gaze at the new Martin-Folke on display. Ted felt, suddenly, sorry for that car. It had seemed such a noble thing till now, but he could feel it contract and blush for its own poor failings under the scrutiny it bore.

She turned, then, and for a third time Carol Ames and Ted looked straight at each other. But this time, something happened to her too. Ted was almost sure he didn't imagine it. Even through the plate glass, from this distance, he saw color suffuse her face. At once she drew the loop of skins about her throat and started toward him. He experienced a sick kind of pang, remembering what had happened yesterday. Then he hurried to meet her.

"I hope ——" he blurted as he came through the door; and broke off. There'd been a special name, in the Army, for the kind of smile that was all he could achieve at that moment: deprecating, self-condemning, fervently imploring. "Did you get the roses?"

That gaze which now seemed fastened, as always, somewhere past his shoulder slid to the Martin-Folke. "I rather like that car," said Carol Ames, "the looks of it. Would you care to give me a run?"

Ted would. They got into it.

After hitting the highway, Carol took over the wheel. She drove like a man, a man who knows cars and loves them. Relaxed, almost nerveless, she let the needle climb till it hit eighty. Then she let it slowly subside again. Ted sat watching her. She pulled up, switching off the ignition.

"It's a nice car," she admitted. She leaned back against the seat and looked his way thoughtfully. "Do you really like being a car salesman?"

It occurred for the first time to Ted that this was an extremely inadequate thing to be. "I like it all right," he allowed. "I'm not what you'd call ambitious."

She insisted lightly, "But isn't it tiresome, having to play up to people? Especially the people one meets around here. Chamber of Commerce types who can't make up their minds? Matrons with fussy hats who wish there were more chrome on the fenders?"

Ted laughed, obscurely flattered. "Well, but they are amusing. I don't get bored."

"And it's not as if you intended peddling these things all your life, is it?"

Actually, Ted reflected, this was precisely what he'd intended. "No," he said. But not with reluctance.

"You know," she said in a suddenly grave voice, "I didn't mind your calling it a hick town. Even though you said I'd come out of it. I've never really felt a part of Arden."

Ted colored. "I said a lot of things I've regretted since yesterday." He made an awkward gesture and blinked at her. "I hope you've forgiven me, Carol. I've gone on the wagon, incidentally. For good."

She smiled and said, "I think that's wonderful." And her eyes were fixed on his, fully. She turned to the wheel and pressed the starter. "I'll let you know about the car, Ted. I do like it, very much."

She called him at his office two days later. "Ted? This is Carol Ames. Father was wondering if you'd like to come to dinner tomorrow night."

Tomorrow Ted was due at the Morrisons' for dinner. He wondered in passing how he'd get out of it. "I'd like to, Carol. Thanks very much."

"About eight," she said. "And about the car," she went on, as if it were an afterthought. "Father thinks I'd better get another like the one I have. I'm sorry, Ted."

"Why, that's all right, Carol. I'll be there at eight."

He was—having spent fifteen minutes parked on the highway outside the estate.

Polly, that afternoon, had said on the phone, "It doesn't matter a bit, Ted. And I do hope Carol decides on a Martin-Folke."

He didn't say Carol had already decided. "Yes, so do I. I suppose there are people who sort of watch what the Ameses buy."

"I suppose so," agreed Polly. And then, "Yes, of course they do! Listen, have a nice time—they have marvelous food—and we'll see you here one night next week."

"Fine," said Ted.

But they didn't. In fact, he saw nothing of Polly or her family for the next month or so. And he felt guilty about this, but he acknowledged it was his own fault. He wasn't good enough for Polly, for one thing.

It surprised him to discover, more and more, how much downright malice he was capable of. But as Carol said, he was an extraordinarily discriminating person. In restaurants or at the country club it startled him, sometimes, to hear his own reflections—about the town, and the inhabitants of it.

Ted would say, "Now, who —— Oh, yes, Carl Haynes! You know, manager of that dry-goods store on Center Street. I had him out for a run last week. And Carol, you've never heard so many platitudes! I don't mind platitudes, especially, but when someone tries to make them sound like epigrams! I don't know, I just couldn't butter the man up. Even though it meant losing an order."

Carol would smile, and it thrilled him to see the admiration in her eyes. "Well, don't let it bother you. You know, I've never thought Martin-Folkes was your line, anyhow. Neither does father. I want you to talk to him, one day, about real estate, Ted. He loves talking business, and he's said what a pity it is you're wasting your time selling cheap cars, that you can't deliver for months and months."

"I'd like to."

But he wouldn't, really. He liked just what he was doing, though less than at first. The bracket of people who were interested in Martin-Folkes—modest businessmen and their wives—had begun to annoy him, somehow. They were so indecisive, so fussy; they needed such prodding, though they tended to withdraw when pressed too hard Ted had done rather too much pressing lately. And his annoyance had shown through too frequently. If things went on like this, he'd be driven to that chat with Mr. Ames.

Not that that would be so bad, either, come to think of it. Absurd to think of Carol Ames' husband being a dealer in cheap cars. And to Carol it was immeasurably absurd—she implied as much.

It was just after the first time he'd kissed her, awed at himself for daring, astonished at Carol for permitting it. But everything happened so naturally that he'd taken her in his arms before he stopped to think. It was late at night, after driving back from dinner in Lancing. They rarely dined in Arden or at the country club. As Carol said, it was such a relief to get away from the same dreary faces—even though faces quite as dreary were all that could be found in the vicinity of Arden.

They had strolled out across the garden before Ted drove back to town, and as they reached the fountain, he turned and quietly drew her to him and kissed her. For a too brief moment her lips lay cool and sweet on his.

Then she stepped back and gazed up at him quizzically. "Ted, I like you very much. I hope you realize that."

Still dumfounded at what had happened, Ted replied fervently, "But I can't think what this place would have been like without you, Carol! I'd have gone back to New York after a month or two, I guess."

She said with the barest trace of reproach, "But this isn't a bad place, Ted. You mustn't be too critical of it."

This puzzled him. Because all Carol ever seemed to do was criticize the town.

"It's my home, after all," she went on, "and I'm fond of it, really. I don't think I'll ever want to leave it."

He wanted to ask, Why? You've no friends here—obviously, of course, because you don't want these people for friends. But there'd be another kind in a large city. Gay people, sophisticated ones, like yourself.

He didn't say this, but he wondered about it. He wondered about something else, too—Carol's father. An amiable, gently-spoken man who seemed to fail utterly in understanding her. Ted discovered this in the library, one evening, while they waited for Carol to come downstairs.

There was a portrait of Carol's mother over the fireplace; Ted had seen it and admired it before. He said warmly to Mr. Ames, "What a beautiful person she must have been!"

Mr. Ames looked at him dubiously, then at the portrait. He smiled and took a cigar from a silver humidor on the table. "You're quite mistaken. My wife wasn't beautiful at all." Seeing Ted's surprise, he continued, "Hardly even pretty. It's an excessively flattering portrait, and I've never cared for it. But she was the gayest—the most lovable woman in the world." He lighted his cigar and declared between puffs, "Everyone adored her. Everyone! That's what has ma it so difficult for Carol."

"You mean ——"

"Not to have any personality."

Ted was less shocked than bewildered.

The old gentleman sat back in a leath chair which bore the permanent imprint his body. "She has beauty, of course, ar style such as her mother never had. But it not the same thing, is it?"

It would have been no more startling t hear this man proclaim a doctrine of revol tion. It was revolution: he seemed never an thing but docile before his daughter.

Mr. Ames continued with a sigh, "Car confuses prejudice with identity. Haven you noticed that? There's practically nothin she likes—or admits liking. That's why know you'll be a good thing for her. You hav enthusiasm and strong opinions. And yo enjoy life tremendously."

Which was true enough, Ted suppose But what had led Mr. Ames to believe th was a result of private conversations, like th one—never while Carol was present. Whe she was there, Ted was happy only to liste and agree. He loved hearing her speak. Tha musical, low voice was better than musi sometimes he scarcely heard the intelligen it uttered, the melody being sufficient.

"I'm afraid I can't agree with you, sir, he said, frowning. "To me, Carol seems ——

At that moment, Carol entered. Again hardly heard what sh said, enchanted as h was by the way sh looked. "Where sha we go for dinner, Ted Not the club, do yo think? It's so depres ing on Thursday ev nings."

But as he rose to g Ted saw Mr. Am watching him. And f an instant—encounte ing that kindly, grav regard—he felt almo a little chilled.

Someone once asked Professor Charles Townsend Copeland, of Harvard, why he lived on the top floor of Hollis Hall in his small, dusty old rooms, and suggested that he move.

"No," said Copeland. "No, I shall always live on the top floor. It is the only place in Cambridge where God alone is above me." Then, after a pause. "He's busy—but He's quiet."

It wasn't till an afternoon in late June tha he saw Polly again. He'd had glimpses, c course: her rosy face had beamed at hi across a dance floor, and occasionally sh would flash by in her car, waving. But th time, encountering her on Center Street as h strolled back from lunch, it was necessary t stop and speak. He thought "necessary" un til she clasped his hand and twinkled up a him. Then he felt warm and pleased, just a she seemed to see him.

"Ted, how are you? I hear the jalopy bus ness is colossal!"

"Less than colossal, I'm afraid. But ho are you, Polly? You're looking grand."

Polly said, "Whoever heard of a soli freckle looking grand? But she won't sta out of the sun, the silly girl! How's Carol?

She asked this quite naturally. Ted, how ever, at once felt sheepish about it. Eve stronger than this, he felt a peculiar kind o nostalgia for something—not for Polly, o course, but for laughter. He and Carol smile at things, but they rarely laughed.

"Listen," he said on an impulse, "wh don't you get a fella and all of us do some thing soon? Friday night, maybe? The Del has a new orchestra with a very mean rumb rhythm."

Polly said happily, "Done and done! Sha we meet there for dinner? Please say yes— it's my birthday, and they give you a cake o the house if you sort of drop a hint."

"I'll tell them about it," Ted assured he with a laugh. "At that, it'll be the first time ever got anything free out of this town."

Her smile wavered, and Ted at once curse himself, remembering the Morrisons' hospi tality. What he'd said was the sort of thin that amused Carol.

He went on quickly, "Seven o'clock. So you, Polly!"

"You'll really be there?"

"Certainly we'll be there!"

But for a time it appeared this might no be the case.

Carol took the news curiously. They were lounging beside the Ames pool, soaking up sun before Ted sped back to town and an appointment. Carol wore tailored shorts and a halter; Ted had merely stripped off his shirt. For some reason, he still couldn't bring himself to have Carol see his leg.

"By the way," he said in a casual way, "I made us a date tomorrow evening. With Polly and somebody. It's her birthday—I suggested we all have dinner at The Dells."

Carol, spilling oil along the café-au-lait length of her legs, paused and stared at him. "Polly Morrison?"

"I was their house guest, you know. When I first came here."

She said slowly, "I think that's odd, making an engagement without consulting me."

Ted laughed and reached across the mat for a cigarette. "What's odd about it, honey? We are having dinner together Friday night, aren't we?"

"I'm not altogether sure, now. I think it's very odd indeed—you knowing how I dislike Polly."

He sat up. But this was unbelievable! "Carol, you're not serious? Why should you dislike Polly?"

Carol looked at him a moment, then bent over her legs again. "She's ordinary. And in any case," she said in a small voice, "why should we spend an evening with people when—when it could be just the two of us?"

At this, he was touched. He took up her hand and brushed his lips over the tapered fingers. "Honey, because they were nice to me, and I've neglected them, that's all! What's one evening?"

She didn't look up again. But he felt some conflict occurring inside her. He held on to her fingers, waiting for it to be over, not knowing what he could do if she refused. Actually, he knew very well: he'd call Polly and say there'd been other plans.

Carol drew her hand away. His relief was overwhelming when she said in her usual voice, "Very well . . . if you wish it, Ted. But please don't call me 'honey.' You sound like a salesgirl."

THE maître d' at The Dells was new, and more than anxious to please. Greeting Carol—cool and exquisite in summer furs—he had no need to be told this was someone who mattered. Having led them to the remote table where Polly and her friend were seated, the man turned to Ted with an imploring look.

"Perhaps you'd be happier at a table on the floor, sir?"

Before Ted could reply, Carol glanced at the man distastefully and said, "On the floor? Heavens, no." He fell away, seeming withered. Carol looked across the table and said. "Hello, Polly."

"Carol!" exclaimed Polly. "You know Tommy. Ted Charteris, this is Tommy Fergus. Look, we're having champagne! I can never be blasé about it."

Tommy was a nice-looking boy who'd been quite gay till Carol and Ted approached. He said politely, "Hello, Carol. It's good to see you." He nodded at Ted, and smiled briefly.

"They've redone this place, haven't they?" observed Carol as Ted drew out a chair for her.

"Isn't it elegant?" Polly said. "And the band's very special."

Carol said, glancing across at the bandstand, "Oh, yes. We heard them at a place in Lancing last month. Remember, Ted? Later, they put on women's hats and do novelty songs. It's amusing in a painful sort of way."

Her voice was controlled as an actress'. Tommy Fergus shot her a glance and then began to tell Polly about a radio combo he liked. Ted caught Carol's eye and trie smile encouragingly. She stared right thr him. Her gaze, expressionless, slid about room. He thought, She's honestly going to all this. I shouldn't have let her in for it—s never forgive me.

Then he heard Polly's laughter. He tu and couldn't help smiling at her. At the s time, he felt reproach at himself for bein any way entertained when Carol was happy. But it was impossible to keep f smiling when you looked at Polly. She such a frank, free, happy person.

"TED, they're perfect."

"They must be. You're inspired."

Polly was referring to the band; he was ferring to her rumba. Radiant, Polly stepp away, spun twice around, and rejoined Te flawless rhythm. She gasped at her c cleverness.

"Am I making a spectacle of myself? your fault—nobody rumbas like you."

Ted laughed and pressed her hand. "I l it! I've missed it, too," he admitted, " cause Carol doesn't like dancing. We'll h to bribe those guys to play more rumba

Ted suddenly realized that Carol was scared too. She stood there, unable to move, just Caldwell or sideless because of the crush of dancers.

"Carol," muttered Caldwell. "Why, hello, Carol!" He wavered a moment, his eyes glittering sardonically on hers. Then he looked at Ted and said, "Who's the sucker?"

The intake of Carol's breath was audible. She wheeled to Ted and said, "Will you please get me out of here?" Even in his confusion, Ted was shocked at how frightened her face seemed.

But Caldwell grabbed Carol's arm firmly. He spoke past her to Ted. "Or maybe you're not a sucker? Maybe you're just more—more greedy than the rest of us? Is that it?"

Before Ted could do anything, Caldwell's wife seized his shoulder helplessly. "Pete, I swear if you don't come back to the table——"

Polly came pushing up, Tommy behind her. Her eyes flicked from Carol to Caldwell, then to Ted. At the same time she said, "Pete Caldwell! I've been looking for you! It's my birthday—you've got to dance with me!"

Caldwell ignored them all. Holding on to Carol's arm, he went on doggedly to Ted. "A man-eating monster fella—falling in love with this dame is signing your life away! I know, because I did it! Right up to the altar, didn't I, Carol?"

Ted struck his hand from her arm. He said quietly, "Come on, Carol," and drew her past him.

But now Caldwell clutched Ted's sleeve and held on to it, breathing hard. "A fact! A fact!" he repeated. "Ask Polly there. Her brother was one of the casualties—he ran clear down to South America to get away."

Ted pushed him back, more roughly than he intended for some reason he felt sympathy for the man. Caldwell floundered back against his wife, then recovered. He swore, gathering himself, and came at Ted swinging.

Carol's voice screamed out at Caldwell past Ted. "Let him alone! Can't you see he's a cripple? Let him alone!"

Aghast, Ted looked around at her. At the same time he lifted an arm, deflecting Caldwell's blow. As he jerked back toward Caldwell, then, he saw Polly. She smiled at him confidently and said, "Sock him, Ted!" Ted did.

They drove back to the Ames place in a silence which Ted later recalled as thundering. There was a thunder inside himself too: the echo of his own thoughts charging against one another. But when they drew up under the portico, and after Ted had switched off the headlights, he felt an interior calm that was surprising. He lighted himself a cigarette, his hands steady, then turned and gazed at Carol's profile. It was stencil-sharp against the deeper darkness outside.

After a moment she spoke, nearly inaudible. "It was horrible."

Ted said, "Yes. I thought it was rather horrible myself."

Her voice remained low, tense. "I hate this town—I couldn't tell you how much I hate it."

"And yet," declared Ted calmly, "you never want to leave it, do you?"

She didn't reply to this.

He went on, "Shall I try to tell you why?"

She made no sound.

"Because you like it here. Because you're nourished, somehow, by what you despise. You try to make a—an identity for yourself by hating everything."

"You sound," she said coolly, "like my father."

"Do I? Well, it wouldn't be necessary for anyone to point it out to me." He added, "I'm at least as bright as Pete Caldwell. Or Polly's brother."

Carol murmured, almost in an awed voice, "How can you dare ——"

Ted tried to explain. "Oh, it's not just being disillusioned—not altogether. I'm sorry for you, too, I think. Because it must be awful to dislike everything." She turned and started to speak, but he cut her off. "You've never even liked me, really. You've just felt superior to me, along with everybody else. For example, all this time you've been thinking of me as a cripple, haven't you?"

Carol was silent.

He leaned back and gazed up at the roof of the car. "When I was a kid, there was a game we used to play, 'King of the Hill.' The object was to reach the top of [illegible] and keep all the other kids from dislacing you. Well, you're 'Queen of the Hill,' Carol. But it gets a little lonely up there, sometimes, so you're willing to let somebody—a husband, maybe—come halfway up it. But at the very top, there's room for only one. And that's got to be you." He closed his eyes, continuing chiefly to himself: "It won't be easy. I suppose losing the habit of loving you. But I will, after a time. I see now that I don't want any part of the hill—not even the top of it. I'd rather be down in the valley with the ordinary people." He opened his eyes and turned to her. He spoke solemnly, earnestly. "Why, Carol, we could! marry each other! I was well on my way to disliking everything just as much as you. We wouldn't produce anything but a lot of sneers!"

She put her fingers on the handle and pushed the door open. "You're just what I've always suspected," she said. "Vulgar."

"I sort of think I am. You know something? I like being a car salesman!"

She stepped out under the portico and glanced back at him and said, "I wouldn't send flowers this time if I were you, Ted."

He was astonished. "Why should I? This time I'm sober!"

"Because they won't do any good. In fact, I don't wish to see you for a long, long time."

There was a pause while she waited. Then Ted said wonderingly, "You know something else, Carol? I just thought of it. I think you're sort of vulgar, yourself."

She slammed the door. He heard her heels go clicking sharply up the steps. He sighed and sat there thoughtfully a moment. Then he drove back to Arden.

It was some months later. He and Polly were at the club for dinner. It was a Thursday night, and the dining room was crowded. The two of them were laughing and talking a good deal, because people kept stopping at their table to congratulate them.

"I wish," sighed Ted, after a time of this, "we'd gone somewhere else for dinner."

"No, you don't. The best part of an engagement is being told how nice it is. It makes you begin to believe it."

Ted nodded gravely. "You're right." Then, after they had exchanged smiles, his gaze slipped over Polly's head to a man and girl being seated at a corner table. The girl was beautiful. The man was someone he had never encountered before.

"Seen a ghost?" asked Polly.

"As a matter of fact, yes," he told her. "Carol Ames."

"Who's she with? Her father?"

"No," said Ted, staring frankly. "It must be a new man in town. He looks nice."

"They usually do." Polly took up a fork and rapped herself smartly on the wrist with it. "I didn't mean that! I owe a lot to Carol Ames. My brother's making a fortune in Brazil. I've got you—already nice and tanned so I'm spared the trouble."

Ted forgot Carol's presence and gazed at his fiancée seriously.

"Just the same," he said, "I never deserved to get off so easily. I acted like a fool—I'm aware of that. I want you to know it, too, honey."

"Oh, well," said Polly. She plunged her fork into her salad. "Men can't be blamed, poor souls. They're built like that. Especially," she added tolerantly, "new ones."

Willie wiggled her right foot and made the shoe slap against her bare heel. "Roger?"

"Can't do it, thanks, Willie."

"Then, if Pete shows up ——"

"Thought you said he called up he was coming," said Mrs. Hall belligerently. "Said he's coming, he's coming, ain't he?"

"If he doesn't change his mind," said Willie with edged patience. "You know, Mrs. Hall, people do change their minds. I realize it's terribly inconsiderate of them, but it does happen. Now about Jan. I'm afraid I don't ——"

"You dunno," said Mrs. Hall, summing up the whole matter. She turned and marched back to the kitchen.

Willie dropped her work, grabbed at her own hair with both hands and mimicked madness. "I ask you," she wailed softly. "What have I ever done that the rockbound coast of Maine itself should rear up in my kitchen? Roger, lamb, listen. I have begged, I have pleaded, I have implored her. 'Let us relax,' I have said. 'Please. It's summertime. Let us take things a little easier. Let us not worry about a trifle of dust or a minute or two, this way or that!' But"—Willie's voice was full of woe—"she won't, she can't. She doesn't hold with taking it easy."

Roger began to laugh. "Why don't you get you a nice fat mammy?"

"Because they're extinct," said Willie promptly. "Pity we didn't stuff one for the Smithsonian."

"THEM chickens Gray sent over," said the housekeeper, plunking the bucket back on the bar, "ain't fit to eat."

Willie peered over her glasses.

"You'd ought to tell Gray's boy when he comes with the cream."

"Couldn't you tell him, Mrs. Hall? I don't believe I'm much of an authority. I don't think I've met a chicken in the flesh for years." Willie's voice trailed.

"Roosters," snapped Ada Hall.

"That's bad, h'm?" said Willie. Roger choked on his new drink.

"What you'd ought to tell Gray, you didn't order no roosters and you won't be put off with none."

"But maybe he just made a mistake," said Willie gently. "Shall we give him the benefit of the doubt?"

"Only mistake he made, he forgot I was up here."

"Betcha." Willie's face twinkled wickedly for a moment. Then she held out her red-nailed hand. She cocked her dark head. "Are they impossible?"

"Miz Peterson," said Ada with great dignity, "if you want 'em, I'll cook 'em. But it's my place to let you know they ain't worth it."

"Yes, of course it is," cooed Willie, "and thank you, Mrs. Hall."

"You're welcome." Ada departed.

Roger rolled his lank form across the room, still laughing. "Don't you know a rooster from a hen, honest, Willie?"

"Would you? Without feathers? Minus sound effects?" Willie squared her angular shoulders. "Oh, I won't get out of it. You'll see. That woman cannot believe that I haven't got a burning interest in the economics of the kitchen. She ——"

"I bet she seen her duty and she done it, all her life. The type, eh, Willie?"

"That's our Ada. It's when she sees my duty and I gotta do it that it's so peachy," said Willie with a vicious jab of her crochet hook. "Oh, she's a ruby and all that, and I dasn't let her get away, because there's nobody else left in the world who's even interested in this job. Who can blame them, of course? If I can only maintain diplomatic relations through September, until I get Jan parked back in school ——"

"Speaking of your fair daughter, Willie, my old," said Roger, putting his glass down on the rummy table. "What's all this walking around? Come clean, now. I drop in here to see why the heck I haven't been asked out for a week end so far this summer, and no Jan for two hours. Out walking, you say. H'm. A likely story."

"Walking's the thing, you know," she said, casting him one of those glances over the spectacle rims. "Haven't you noticed the flat heels?"

"Diversions aside," said Roger. "Who's she walking with?"

"I bet you've met Cyrus. Not lately, since he's in the Air Corps. But before the war, he used to patrol that nasty little ten miles below the village."

"Not the cop!" groaned Roger, his mind licking up this interesting information. "Don't tell me he gave Jan a ticket and they met cute!"

"Nonsense," said Jan's mother. "She's known Cy ever since she was six years old, which is when we began to come up here."

"He's a native, huh? But what's the meaning of all this walking around?"

"Shut up, you clown," said Willie, leaning forward.

"Yes, but ——"

"Whisst—whisst. That's his mother."

"Oh," said Roger flatly.

"Doesn't mean a thing. How could it? Shut up, Roger."

Willie had ears like a fox. Ada Hall was bustling in, setting the table in the alcove.

"Cy's an awfully nice chap," said Willie in her lady voice. "You'd like him, Roger."

"Well, I'd—uh—certainly like to meet him—uh—certainly would," said Roger.

He was eaten with curiosity. It was his compelling emotion. He thought this was funny, both kinds of funny. Humorous funny and odd funny. Willie and this New England woman were a pair to laugh at. But Jan and the woman's son were out walking, and that was . . . funny. He said no more, but his pale eyes were bright.

> Folks think they grow old by living: but they grow old rather by not living. —IVAN PANIN.

In the alcove, Ada Hall set, with exquisite efficiency, the supper table. Then the top half of the pale-timbered front door swung in. The man who pushed at it fumbled at the catch of the bottom half. He was a big man, dark, blue-jowled. He had good eyes, although the flesh around them was pouchy. The thinning hair on his bare head was rumpled, as if he'd been riding in the wind. He came in slowly. He had a suitcase in his hand.

Willie didn't even look behind her. "His nibs?" she said.

"Hiya, Pete." Roger was cordial. "So you made it?"

"Hello." Pete Peterson's voice was deep, soft and tired.

"How do, Mr. Peterson," said Ada Hall pleasantly.

"How do you do, Mrs. Hall," he replied gravely. "How are you?"

"Just fine, thanks," she said. She nodded and withdrew.

"That's another thing," said Willie moodily. "Respect, she gives him."

"I'm not around enough," said Pete Peterson coolly, "for her to learn better. Where's Jan?"

"The girl's walking like mad, in this heat," said Roger. "Say, thirsty? Use a drink?" He was more the host than his host was.

"Sold," said Pete. He sat down. He looked uneasy and out of place, in his business suit, his polished shoes, his town shirt and tie.

"Hot in town?" said Willie carelessly.

"Not very." The chill in his voice disappeared too obviously when he turned to Roger. "How's the air-conditioning business?"

"Flourishing, flourishing, or near enough. How's your racket? People buying themselves pipe organs today?"

Pete took the tall drink and looked down into it gloomily "We're a little confused."

"'Smatter? Materials?" chirped Roger. "What's the good word from Ben Jay?"

"He's flourishing," said Ben heavily. "Old slab of granite. Stubborn, you know. Won't

"Sounds almost as if you're rooting for him," said Roger curiously. "I thought you kept the artistic old tongue in the cheek."

"Can't help it," said Pete, rubbing his face wearily. "After all, I've been tied up to the old so-and-so, saying 'yes,' 'no,' and 'maybe,' for twenty years now. I've got used to him."

"Adjusted, you know," said Willie, with sly malice.

"That's right," said Pete evenly and coldly. "I took the job originally so we could afford to get married, if you remember."

"Time flies, doesn't it?" said Willie, yawning.

The silence was tingling with a queer distant anger.

"Seriously," said Roger, hunching forward. He was adept at breaking these little silences, although he took notes, just the same. His gossipy mind gleaned what there was. "You're not worried, Pete?" he said.

"Ben Jay Wilcox needs no man's worry. Of course he made no money during the war. He simply rode it out. Did a little secondhand business. Not much. Survived."

"Never gave in to the pressure, did he?" said Roger wonderingly.

"Pressure?"

"Don't you remember? 'What did you do in the Great War?' his grandchildren are going to ask him."

"He hasn't got any grandchildren and I doubt if he'd care if he had. Too old to learn new tricks, he said. I can understand that." Pete drank deep. "Oh, we'll get back into the swing, although sometimes I get the strangest feeling that every other business in the world is riding on some generated steam we never tapped."

"Didn't hurt him to make no money. Couldn't, could it?"

"He's lousy with money," said Pete listlessly. "Always was. Always will be."

"Well." Roger looked at his watch. He got up. He tweaked Willie's ear. "And what did you do in the Great War, grandma?"

"Hadn't you realized?" said Willie brightly. "Now, you've heard of civilization? That which they all fought so gallantly to preserve? Well? That was me."

"Oh, yeah!" said Roger, as if he were enlightened.

"SPEAKING of civilization"—Pete's voice was bleak—"Aunt Ethel sent a present. It's in the car."

Willie dropped her yarn and began to tear her hair.

"What's the matter now?" Roger waited, anticipating fun.

"You never ran afoul of Pete's Aunt Ethel? Upholstered like a button-back couch, bluing in her hair?"

"Harmless old thing." Pete's dark eyes were fixed on his wife. "Coos at you."

"Harmless, like a dove with fangs," spat Willie. "The old dovesy's got the habit of sending me a present. Some crummy object she garners from a bazaar. And the ordeal!" Willie pantomimed despair. She uncurled her lean figure and rose and struckoneof herangular attitudes, always surprisingly full of Willie's own peculiar grace. "Look. First, I must be surprised. Then I make with the suspense. "All the traffic will bear, I suppose," she answered placidly. "I'd like to keep a decent small place."

In the man's mind leaped a vision of what she'd call decent. Something tiny, exquisite, expensive. "In town?" he asked.

"Naturally. Among my friends. We won't meet; and if we did, would it matter?"

"No," he said.

"What will you do with this place?"

"Sell it." He came down the room to stand behind the chair where Roger had been playing cards. He looked, not at her, but into the fireless hearth. He began to speak monotonously. "This place doesn't mean anything to me. Time and time again, I've come out here, always saying to myself, 'Ah, the country, peace, nature, air, sunshine.' But when I get here, it never works. I'm just uncomfortable. I think it's because I've got no room, no place to stay." Now he accused her. "You've usurped all the room, Willie."

"So you've said," she murmured.

"If I ever had my half, here, you've swarmed all over it. This room—I never even liked the color."

"Oh, it's amusing." She looked over her specs at the beams, the bright murals. "Of course you could have it painted over to your own notion. Something dingy and classical."

"This forty acres is the only bit of land I own," he went on, paying her no mind. "Everywhere else I am a renter, with my feet at least six stories off the ground."

"Oh, come now, Pete. In your palmiest days you were scarcely the barefoot type."

"You never shared anything in your life, Willie," he said flatly. "Once you take an interest, it's yours."

"Because you won't follow. With your peculiar brand of jealousy ——" She stopped herself and sighed gustily. "We both know all the vague, intangible, unsettleable grievances we've got against each other, and if they could have been settled, we'd have settled them. Therefore, it's just one of those things." She waved the crochet hook.

"That's right," he said.

"So shall we skip it? How about breaking the news to Jan?"

"It won't be news to her, do you think? You've ——"

"Would you like to indulge in about forty-five minutes of lecturing me on my iniquities?" she inquired sweetly. "Maybe you'd better get it off your chest once more." She smiled. It was a real smile. This was the baffling kind of thing Willie would do. The smile was real, he'd swear. The sweetness was real too. "Go ahead, Pete. Last chance, maybe. I can crochet."

HE said wearily, "Never mind. When it's got to the point that we're bored with quarreling ——"

"We've been bored with that for about nine years by my reckon," said Willie calmly, "though we quarreled with a good deal of gusto for eight."

"And we had a year, at the beginning ——"

Her eyes darted, behind the specs. "Oh, it was a novelty, being married. And we had a baby."

She's afraid I'm going to pull out a sentimental stop, the man thought. She hates it. She can't bear it. She's afraid of it. "You had a baby," he said bitterly. Some other part of his mind said it. She made no reply. "Why don't you say that happens to be Nature's arrangement?" he jabbed.

"It wasn't a very good crack the first seventeen times I made it." She yawned. "Aunt Ethel will have a fit," she added mildly.

"Yes." He got out of the chair and began to roam again. "I'm not unhappy about this divorce, you know," he told her.

Then Willie did it again, dropped her work, leaned to him, said warmly, "Oh, I know, Pete. But, like having a bad tooth out, you'll miss me for a while."

"That's a lot truer than you realize."

"I don't know why, whenever you agree with me it's because I don't know what I'm saying." She leaned back, sucked on the end of the crochet hook, and yet she was smiling.

He couldn't get anywhere, couldn't reach her. There was a wall up between them and

They came out of the little thicket and th path lay before them across the lower m adow. Now they could see the house, up on the slope, a picture house, squat, thick- ro ed, fat-chimneyed, a foreign house in th se parts, departing violently from local tr ditions.
What shall we do, Cy?" Jan asked. "You'll have to stay for supper." She put he cheek on his arm, just below the shoul- d. They'd stopped walking, somehow.
I ought to stay down and eat with the ol man," Cy said. He put his chin on the to of her head.
But when we tell them—maybe we could go down and bring your father ——"
I don't want any family celebration."
There won't be any celebration," she said se erly.

He put his arm around her and kissed the c ner of her eye. He was tall, and big in p portion. There was something about him th t was quiet. Not that he wasn't vigorous an quick, not that he was placid, exactly, bu he had some strong, secret quietude. The gi l's face was suddenly calmed and smoothed to still beauty, as if by being near him she ha le a kind of rest, deep rest.
"Cy, you tell them," she murmured.

"All right." He made it seem a simple and easy thing to do. "Gosh," he said, "I remember your place when it was being built." He was looking up the hill. "Pa was boss carpenter, you know. Your mother bossed him. You don't remember the first time you came up here. You were too little."
"Oh, Cy," she protested, "I've known you ever since I was born."

"Nope. Not quite. You were kinda cute, Jan. I had to watch you, that day, to see you didn't get down as far as the mill pond." He grinned. "Me, at my age, minding babies."
"Fifteen years old."
"But I dunno how it was, I got the habit."
She smiled. "The first day, every year, I knew you'd be there. I relied on it. And then I'd find out what happened all winter. How the old diving log got lost ——"
"I remember."
"Oh, Cy."
"You were cute." His arm tightened. "But I never thought I'd marry you."
"Neither did I," said Jan.
He kissed the corner of her eye once more and put her on the path. "We'd better get along." They walked, holding hands. "Funny, how you grew up and the way I felt about you grew up too," he murmured. "Not that you're so awful grown."
She made a face. Jan was seventeen. She had Willie's grace without Willie's angles. She had Pete's fine eyes. And pale golden hair she seemed to have invented herself. Her features were dainty. She was a firm, round, little body and yet there was something delicate and fine and precise about her.
"I wonder why it was, I always felt I had to see you, your first day, every spring," he went on.
"Because you loved me?"
"I kinda worshiped you," he agreed soberly. "Gosh, Jan, you've been part of my life for years and years."
"You've been part of mine too. But it's strange, I never knew till now how important you were. How was it, Cy, that I didn't know?" He only shook his head. "Cy," she wailed, "I didn't even think about you in the winters. Oh—but I did! I did! I . . . felt that you were in the world."
"Did you?" he said tenderly.
"Somebody strong and friendly who watched out for me. But wasn't I stupid? Wasn't I dumb?"
They were below the brow of the hill. No one could see. He kissed her soundly, and the small expensive camera slung on a strap around her neck was crushed between them. Jan pulled away, and rearranged it.
"I hope they come out," she sighed. "Cy, let me take one more."
"I want all the eight I took of you, remember."
"To show the boys?"
"No, ma'am."
"If we could only get some of both of us ——"
"Yeah," he said, suddenly eager. "If I could have one of the two of us, close together, I could look at it and say, 'See, boy, it wasn't any dream. Here you are up in the snow, but there was a summer.' Kinda keep it, the sun and the summer humming around, and the way your hair smells."
"Oh"—she almost wept—"I wish we could."
"If I could look at you in that dress with your face a little bit dirty the way it is right now."
"Scares me." She grabbed his arm.
"Nah. Don't be scared," he said. "There's nothing. And it's not going to be for long. It'll be the last stretch for me."
"But so far," she whispered. "If you have to go so far again, a whole continent, a half a world ——"

Scientific etymology cannot explain how potatoes came to be called "spuds." Irish tradition, however, traces the word to the age of Elizabeth and Raleigh. When the famous cavalier brought the potato back from the New World, press and pulpit denounced it as unfit for human consumption. In Ireland, opposition was so strong that the antipotato faction formed a Society for the Prevention of Unclean Diet. From the initial letters of the group, so it is said, came the word "spud."

"I'm [illegible] going to explain [illegible] to you [illegible]," said Cy. "Listen, Jean, it's [illegible] you said. You'll feel [illegible] in your world, a little [illegible] world after all. I know I'll feel [illegible] you [illegible] being out."

She nodded. Her face was beyond speaking, her eyes mere wells of hurt.

They climbed through a gap in the [illegible] that crossed the road. They could see [illegible] through the great window, and as [illegible] thought them a lovely ice figure. But when they had passed the door, they saw her.

"Ada!"

Ada Hall turned the gasoline pale a quarter of an inch in a [illegible] cylinder. "Hi, Cy!" She wiped a [illegible] she was, and they walked toward her. "This was [illegible] year. It was a pleasing [illegible] across the next mile.

"We [illegible] it up too. Just [illegible] afternoon."

Ada's long face another inward [illegible] smiled. Then at

"I [illegible] you don't mind," Jan's [illegible] pushed out [illegible] "I want to marry Cy [illegible] I do."

"I am [illegible] against you, Jan," said Cy's mother. The [illegible] pulled the girl off balance a little. She [illegible] back against Cy's chest. "But [illegible] Ada drew [illegible] in a [illegible] said [illegible] quietly also."

"Now see. We'll go [illegible] tell pa."

Ada leaned past them. "I've got [illegible] I said [illegible] be helped, we'll make the best of it." Her face was bleak. Jan looked to Cy for help.

"Sure. I'll talk him," said Cy, wary and smiling. "Say, Ada, you keep an eye out for [illegible] I'll [illegible] need?"

"Yeah, I will," the woman said. Her eyes watered, very blue in her [illegible] face. "Well, Jan, you and me'll [illegible] out, I guess."

There was no [illegible] Ada turned the [illegible] and, awkwardly, walked [illegible] main [illegible] and went out into the [illegible].

"Oh, Cy, doesn't she like me?"

"It will [illegible]."

"But, Cy! ——"

He [illegible] "Listen, kid. You'll catch on to [illegible] when it comes." He [illegible] "Say, [illegible] doesn't like it too much, but it's [illegible] mine, and it [illegible] that way we want [illegible] she'll be on our side, and we [illegible] pa [illegible]."

"I don't know," said Jan dubiously.

"Well, you will," he proclaimed [illegible] could [illegible] it."

"Hi there, peanut!" Pete, in a [illegible] shirt, a pair of slacks, came in from the [illegible] wing. He looked fresh and [illegible] an [illegible] tired.

"Hello, puppy-wuppy!" Jan [illegible] from Cy and dashed down to the [illegible] She kissed him lightly. "Pete, this is [illegible] Hall. You remember him, don't you."

"I think I [illegible]," said Pete, his brow [illegible] friendly bewilderment, "put it down [illegible] handsome uniform."

They shook hands, the two men.

It was then right then, Pete remembered afterward, that Jan knew herself so [illegible] sing in him. For he saw, although he [illegible] understand till later, the flash of [illegible] her face. The pain of the crushing [illegible] sensation, to be two people in one [illegible] Pete a loving pet, his sister, his [illegible] child, and also at the same time, [illegible] Cy's young woman, so sweetly and [illegible] in love. He saw her stare and reach [illegible] for something, anything, to say.

"Pete, do we a favor, will you?"

"Sure, pal. How much do you [illegible]?" Her father put his hand in his pocket.

"Oh, mother, money," scoffed Jan. It's not that. Take a picture of us. Of [illegible] me. Please, will you?"

"Is that your mother's camera?" He turned cautiously. "Not. Nothing [illegible]

"Aw, Pete"—Jan had the tiny [illegible] her hand, the strap off her neck [illegible] wouldn't you?"

"Nope. That's Willie's racket [illegible] won't tangle with it. Sorry, Jan. Ask [illegible] wife."

"I think you're mean," Jan pouted.

"Sure I am. I'm a mean old guy." He turned insultingly to Cy. "I do remember [illegible] I know you well, but I cannot think [illegible]

I was on traffic duty for almost two years with the state police. Stopped you once or twice, Mr. Peterson."

"Well, of course. Obviously, a subconscious block there. No wonder I couldn't place the face."

"And you hired my father to build this house and my mother's in the kitchen." Cy's voice did nothing but remind.

Her father saw Jan's hands flutter on the camera as he caught up with his memory of this tall boy, who had come every spring, every spring taller and bigger. He covered over the little shock. "Hall, of course. Hall, you said. Oh, yes, of course. How is your father?"

"Not very well, sir, I'm sorry to say."

"I'm sorry to hear that."

"Where's Willie?" Jan asked tensely.

Willie was right there. She came striding, her hands flying, her words streaming. "Didn't I have to run out to the gate with Gray's boy and tell him I didn't mean a word of it! Your mother's a hard woman, young Cyrus. If you intend to stay to supper, you break the news. I'm askeered to. . . . Roger was here, Jan." Her bright restless eyes caught the camera. "Shot the roll, did you?" Her thin clever hands took it away from Jan. "Where's the sunshade? Where's the filter kit on here?"

"In my pocket, mother. I didn't bother."

"You probably didn't get anything but junk, either," said Willie. "You can't get clouds without a filter on a day like this."

"I didn't want any clouds."

"Mrs. Peterson," said Cy, "would you mind taking a couple of shots of Jan and me?"

"Why not?" said Willie easily. "Give me the meter."

"We could go out in the sun." Cy made as if to rise.

But Willie was holding the meter up, reading the dial. "No. No. Nature's a lousy background for a portrait. How about a silhouette effect in the window? As the sun goes down? Something sentimental you'd like to have, maybe?"

Pete's fingers tensed on his glass. He could see Jan's eyes.

"I'd like to see our faces," Cy said. "All I meant, Mrs. Peterson, is just a snapshot."

"Snapshot!" cried Willie, in that mock horror of hers. "What innocence! Well, O.K. Let's make it real corny. How about the Victorian? Cy, you sit stiff. Fetch a stool or something, Jan. You put your hand on his shoulder and both of you make like your heads are clamped."

"No," said Jan. Her face was strained.

"Well, you're right, of course," said Willie gracefully. "It's been done. What's this going to be for? Pin-up? I could do a glamour thing with legs. Hike your skirt up, Jan."

"I won't," Jan said. Her father winced.

"Couldn't you," Cy said pleasantly, "just take our picture, the way we are?"

"My dear lad, a picture's got to have an idea."

"Well, that's the idea," Cy said.

"You're not talking about candid!" cried Willie in her half-false dismay. "Jan, do you want him to go back to the barracks with a candid shot? Anyhow, the light's not too strong this time of the day. I'll have to pose you."

"We could sit still," said Cy. And now his voice, still pleasant, still calm, was deeply stubborn.

Willie sighed. "Well, duckies, lean your heads together and smile. I can take a corny picture if I have to."

Cy was still patient. "We didn't exactly want a corny picture. What we wanted was a ——"

"Snapshot?" said Willie, and her voice had the thin, too sweet edge on it, the little sneer, the amusement.

Simplicity is an exact medium between too little and too much.

"Never mind." Jan snatched at the camera. "It doesn't matter." She put the camera on the coffee table.

Cy said quietly, "I guess that's so. I guess it doesn't really matter." He smiled at Jan.

Willie dumped herself into a chair. "Ah, well"—she yawned—"I assure you, like a bare baby on a fur rug, you'd be sorry."

Pete shifted his body. "Are you going to take supper with us—er—Cy?" He was intuitively certain. He was afraid as he watched the boy hesitate and look to Jan.

But Willie's drawl crashed into the little pause. "Your father has an announcement to make," she said, shockingly, ruthlessly.

"If I have," choked Pete, "I'll make it when I think ——"

"Oh, don't make such a thing," said Willie. "Always a good idea to speak up when there's company. Takes the curse off. Go ahead, why don't you?"

"What's the matter?" Jan said.

Cy made as if to rise.

"Don't go," said Pete in cold anger. "Willie wants to be casual. Let us be casual, by all means. Jan, Willie's going to Reno in the fall, as soon as you're off to school. After that I dare say you'll see us, much as you do now, except that you won't see us together." He thought, What a way to tell her! Damn Willie! Damn her soul!

Jan stood still in the dying light. She swayed a little.

"Do you mind, duck?" drawled her mother.

She said slowly and rather bitterly, "No, I don't think so. As a matter of fact, you're both a lot more human when you're not together, and I'm the one to know it."

"Baby ——" Pete got up.

"Don't pick at her," Willie snapped. "We need no scene. What are you after? Baby fingers, drawing us together?"

Jan sat down suddenly and laughed a short ugly little laugh. "That I wouldn't even try," she said.

"And that's so wise, my pet," said Willie. "Now, a drink, please. You too, baby. I prescribe it. Pete, sit down. The new youth's not as vulnerable as in your day, remember. For instance, mark our friend Cyrus over there, all bright-eyed with interest, not even feigning to turn the pages of a book in polite embarrassment."

Pete whirled. "He'll be embarrassed yet, if you can manage it. . . . Sorry, Cy. This is no kind of thing for you to have to listen to," he told him. "Better have another drink all around."

"I was interested," said Cy. "You see, Jan's promised to marry me." He got up and walked over and stood beside his girl. He didn't touch her. He stood there with a certain alertness, waiting.

After a paralyzed moment, Willie moved her head. "Ah, now, that's very sweet," she trilled. "Now, it dawns. Hence the snapshot! Why, my dears"—she came gaily down the room for the camera—"a souvenir you shall have."

"I don't know if you . . . heard me," said Cy quietly. "She's promised to marry me."

"Yes, darling, I heard you," said Willie saucily. "And we shall preserve this charming moment for the album."

"Cy thinks he can get a short leave in the next month," said Jan nervously. "He doesn't think they'll be shipped out for a while. He wants me to come down to New York ——"

"Between now and September?" said Willie vaguely. "So hot in town." She squinted at the meter.

"To get married," Jan said.

"Evidently," said Pete tensely, moving at last, "they mean it, just like that."

"Why would you think we didn't m it?" said Cy.

Willie dropped the meter. "Just let understand," she purred, "exactly what y have in mind."

"We have in mind getting married," sa Jan shrilly. "We t-told you. Cy's got to back. He'll be sent off, maybe to Alas again, for six months and I can't go. So could still go to school in the fall—I mea after we're married." Her lips quivered.

"My poor lambs," murmured Willie.

"Can you support a wife, Mr. Hall said Pete suddenly.

"No better than anyone else in the ser ice, sir. I can once I'm out."

"How?"

"I expect to have my own garage, servi and repairs. I'm a good mechanic."

"This," said Willie, "is ridiculous, yo know. We are nowhere near any financi stage. Jan's not of age."

"No, ma'am," said Cy promptly. "S we'd like your blessing."

"You'll get no blessing out of me. . . Be quiet." She stopped Jan's wail. "Yo two have been treading the fleecy clou and hearing the birdies sing, and that's yo privilege. This wedding, however, is som thing else again. . . . Pete," she demande "do you agree wi me?"

"I do," he sa sadly. "It can't hap pen, Jan."

"Why can't it hap pen?" said Cyru Hall mildly. "Do yo disapprove of me c do you just think she too young?"

"Both, Mr. Hall, snapped Pete.

"Ah, the poor kid dies, and them i love," crooned Willie "Ah, too bad."

"Oh, stop it, Wil lie." Jan leaped u and stamped her foot "I knew you wouldn' like it, but you coul take it with a littl grace. You ——"

"'Grace,' is it?" said Willie grimly "Don't get me wrong, duck. Free is free. know you can run away, and I know yo know we'd shrink from the mess it would b to bring you back. Nevertheless, if you do you will be making a whopping big mistake Furthermore, I'd be glad to tell you why, i you'd care to hear a little realistic speculation, or if you can hear it through the moonlight and the roses."

"I can hear you, Mrs. Peterson," said Cyrus. "Go ahead."

Willie leaned herself against a chair. Her husband watched her. He felt sick at heart. He knew she could be cruel. Let her do it.

"As a matter of fact," said Willie, her green eyes fixed judiciously on the boy, "Jan's not good enough for you."

"What do you mean by that, Mrs. Peterson?" Cyrus' young face was keen, listening hard.

"Look, my lad. Your mother's a sterling character, and so is your father, I know. They are hard-working, God-fearing souls. You've got their ways, and you must, of course, live as you've learned best. Jan's been brought up with a different set of ideas. She's been brought up to think life's too short, while, to you, life is real and life is earnest. Isn't that so? Jan's conditioned toward one kind of life, Cy—a superficial kind it may be, and is, in your lexicon. But, if you marry, I give you a year, no longer, and then the inevitable falling apart."

"Why do you say inevitable, Mrs. Peterson?" asked Cy with that deep and stubborn patience. "Do you go by your own experience?"

Willie's thin brows writhed.

"It isn't always background," said Pete painfully. "Jan, you'd better listen."

Jealousy

By Rhina P. Espaillat

Oh, let me care for lasting things:
The naked tree, the carven stone
That will not fade away to dust
And leave my songs and me alone—

Let me be lost in heartless things;
Only the heartless can endure—
Lest all should fail me in the end,

You can make it in any of the pans shown under STEP 3 below.

Important: This recipe is for SOFTASILK (the Betty Crocker) Cake Flour only. Using any other flour risks a failure.

LARGE CAKE (16 to 20 Servings)	SMALLER CAKE (8 to 10 Servings)

Preheat oven (see pan sizes and corresponding temperatures below). SIFT an ample amount of SOFTASILK Cake Flour onto a square of paper.

STEP 1 . . . . . STIR until smooth. Cool:

¾ cup boiling water	⅜ cup (¼ cup plus 2 tbsp.) boiling water
½ cup cocoa	¼ cup cocoa

MEASURE (level measurements) and SIFT together into mixing bowl:

1¾ cups sifted SOFTASILK (spoon lightly into cup, don't pack)	⅞ cup (¾ cup plus 2 tbsp.) sifted SOFTASILK (spoon lightly into cup, don't pack)
1¾ cups sugar	⅞ cup sugar
3 tsp. baking powder	1½ tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. salt	½ tsp. salt

MAKE a well and add in order:

½ cup cooking (salad) oil such as Wesson or Mazola	¼ cup cooking (salad) oil such as Wesson or Mazola
7 unbeaten egg yolks (medium-sized)	4 unbeaten egg yolks (medium-sized)
the cooled cocoa mixture	the cooled cocoa mixture
1 tsp. vanilla	½ tsp. vanilla
¼ tsp. red food coloring, if desired	⅛ tsp. red food coloring, if desired

BEAT with spoon until smooth.

STEP 2 . . . . . MEASURE into large mixing bowl:

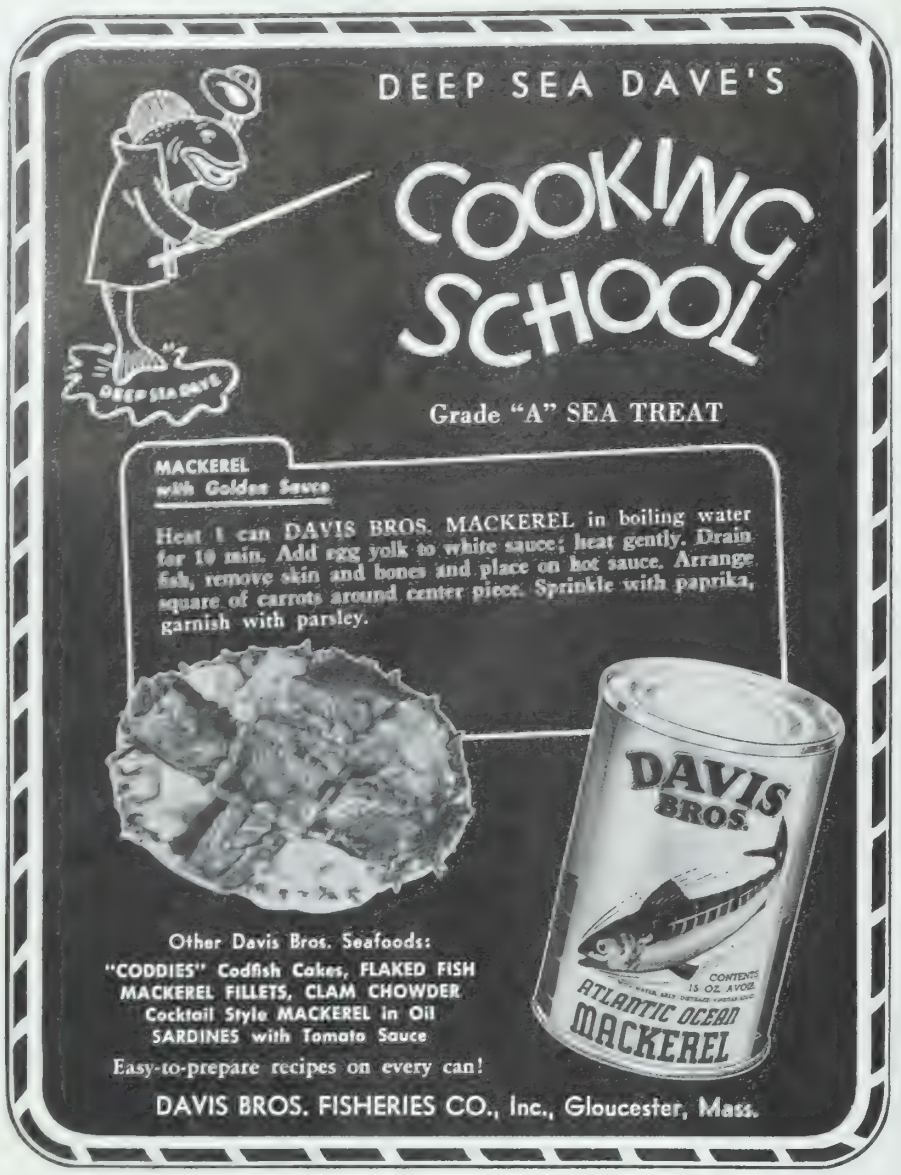
1 cup egg whites (7 or 8)	½ cup egg whites (4 whites)
½ tsp. cream of tartar	¼ tsp. cream of tartar

WHIP until whites form very stiff peaks. They should be much stiffer than for angel food or meringue. Do NOT UNDERBEAT.



STEP 3 . . . POUR egg yolk mixture gradually over whipped egg whites—gently folding with rubber scraper just until blended. Do NOT STIR! Pour into ungreased pan immediately. Bake in:

10-in. tube, 4-in. deep— 325°—55 min., then 350°—10 to 15 min.	8x8x2-in. or 9x9x2-in. square— 350°—30 to 35 min.
	5x10x3-in. loaf— 325°—50 to 55 min.
9x13x2-in. oblong— 350°—45 to 50 min.	9-in. tube, 3½-in. deep— 325°—50 to 55 min.

. . . or until top springs back when lightly touched.

Immediately turn pan upside down, placing tube part over neck of funnel or bottle, or resting edges of square, oblong or loaf pans on two other pans. Let hang, free of table, until cold. Loosen from sides and tube with spatula. Turn pan over and hit edge sharply on table to loosen. Delicious uniced, or . . .

HOBNAIL ICING. Place bowl in ice water, beat with rotary beater until consistency to spread (3 to 5 minutes) 1 cup sifted confectioners' sugar; 2 or 3 egg yolks (or 1 small egg); ¼ cup milk; 3 sq. unsweetened chocolate (3 oz.), melted; 1 tbsp. soft shortening; ½ tsp. vanilla. Double the recipe for larger cakes. Make Hobnail effect with tip of teaspoon.

"Our case," said Willie impatiently, "is a little more subtle, a little less plain. Ye gods, Cyrus"—she threw out her hands—"one look at your mother and me ought to be gruesome-enough warning!"

Pete was looking at Jan's bright hair against that shoulder. "You won't have enough money," he blurted. "I'm afraid Jan can't throw certain luxuries out the window as gaily as she thinks."

"Don't believe them," wailed Jan. "Don't listen, Cy."

"Don't cry," said Cyrus almost absent-mindedly.

"Jan knows we are right," said Willie softly. "That's why she cries."

"It isn't! It's not true!" wept Jan.

"Ah, ah, the little girl protests too much," said Willie gently. "My poor lad, the things that could happen to you and you reck not of. What about dates with other men? Jan's seen married folk, all her life, going about just as if they were people. But in your world, I know, it's like the Ark. The animals go in, two by two, forevermore."

"And so?" said Cy soberly.

"A better way, I grant you," she said quickly, "leading not into temptation. But so dull, Cyrus! And what about your friends? Even your jokes won't seem funny to each other, and that, my dears —— Ah, no!"

"Look, Mrs. Peterson. If you think my way is so much better, so good and all, and if Jan wants to live with me—if she wants to ——"

"How clever of you," cried Willie triumphantly, "to come directly to the point. This is what I am trying to tell you. Wanting will make no difference. It isn't that she doesn't want to, or shouldn't want to. It's that she cannot. Let me ask you, could you live our way?"

"No," said Cy a trifle dangerously, "but you see, I don't want to."

"ARE you so sure Jan wants to?" said Pete. He was looking at the small, stricken face. He ached for her. He thought, If the fight is won, let's know it. Let's stop it.

Cy hardly looked at her. "Take it easy, honey. We better get this straight." He let her go. Jan slipped woefully into a big chair. Cy said, "I know how she's been brought up. I've seen some of it, hanging around here. You claim we'll irritate each other. I can see what you're afraid of. All I want to ask—is that a law?"

"Yes, it's a law," said Willie. "Jan's one of the world's bright young people, full of the tricks of living, and you are one of the world's workingmen, with no tricks at all. I'm not saying which is more admirable. That' the point. The point is, you cannot these facts. And, they being what the you won't live happily ever after, you live together."

Cyrus Hall looked back down at cramped shoulders. He said to Willie H son, "I wonder if you know anything a living together."

"I beg your pardon?"

The deep quiet inside Cyrus was begin to churn. Anger was booming up in his "You don't believe in a little effort, do Mrs. Willie? You just aim to unders all and forgive all, and you sit around i places and you analyze. You wouldn't t do anything. No, no, that would be p corny. Your motto's 'What's the use? mans are so human. Nature's so natural for all of you, the world's going plum hell, although, of course, you can ana the reasons why. It must be nice to 'un stand' with such charming despair."

"UPON my word," said Willie, "we being attacked! This is fascinating." W had her chin up, her head cocked, and maintained that bright interested pos Cy's very teeth.

"All right," Cy said. "I'm plenty mad I'm talking too much, but I've watched You and your first names and your p and your profanity. So you took the soft that he paid for, but it was no use gi even a little effort in return. Don't mak laugh. As if you ever had the faintest what it means to be a family."

"Just a minute, here," said Pete. "Th as far as you go, my friend. That will

"Oh, for heaven's sake, Pete," said wife brittlely. "Chivalry went out with turn of the century." She crossed her and picked up a cigarette. "Now," she s "go on, Cy."

Cy stood in the middle of the floor, e mous and still angry. They looked at e other.

"That's pretty good, Mrs. Willie," he s "I've got a little respect for you. You're perfect type." He went on slowly, anyhow, you're not very important. O when you tell my girl"—the timbre of voice went deeper—"we can't live toget and you tell her it's no use even to try, you tell her she's got to go on the rest of life being smart and meaningless ——"

"We are all meaningless," chirped Wi "Why not be smart about it?"

"Yeah, it's been smart," said Cyrus moment, "to have no respect for the eff of man. But you're getting old. The fa ions will change on you and you won't realize. Your ideas will be as funny as your hats, someday—to the people who come after. I couldn't wish you worse."

"That's right, you couldn't," said Willie steadily.

The fight had taken an odd turn. They understood each other too well. Cyrus seemed to sense and regret it.

"Oh, now I'm being smart," said he in sudden disgust, and he looked young and bewildered. "Listen, listen," he pleaded. "Everything's changing. Got to be changing. There's been too much death, too much fear, too much despair. The world's got to face around. What's the matter with you? You're not in it!"

"What's this?" said Ada's sensible voice. She stood in the kitchen door and sent her authority spinning like a dart down to her son. "Cyrus!"

"All right, ma." He looked exhausted and sad. "I'm through." He went around the chair. He took Jan's miserable shoulders in his big, strong, gentle hands. "Jan, figure it out by yourself." She raised her drowned eyes. "You've had a bad break, being born into this. I know you're confused. Only remember one thing they'll never tell you. You don't have to be the way they are. Not if you don't like it. You're not helpless and nobody is. They'll say it's tough going to fight yourself, and the stuff you're used to, and they're right about that. But when they say we'd surely fail—listen, honey, that's not necessarily so."

"Cy—Cy ——" She reached for him. She implored him. But he held her off.

"Well, you let me know," he said abruptly. "I'm going home, ma." He walked out the front door.

"But a deluge!" said Willie.

Jan looked wildly around her. She surged slowly up. She clenched her hands and her gaze went far, over their heads. She cried Cy's name and stumbled after him.

"You see, Mrs. Hall," said Willie a little breathlessly, "they wanted to marry."

"Ayah," said Ada. "Ructions." Her mouth was grim, "They ain't suited as well as they think they are."

"Of course not. Then you agree ——" Willie leaned forward.

"She don't know where she's at, but Cy's grown. I got nothing to say." The blue eyes flashed. Then Ada went away.

PETE could see them standing in the road. Standing apart, leaning toward each other with a kind of yearning, yet moving no closer together. There was nothing he could do, out there.

"How did Jan get into this?" he demanded angrily.

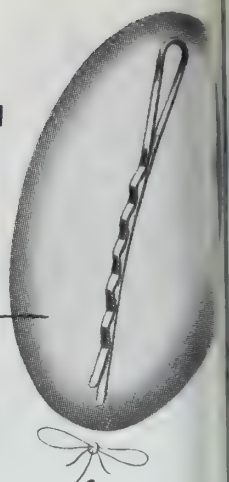
"Don't look at me," said Willie irritably. "Oh, the war broke the system open. Cy in a uniform looks possible. He's going off into danger, I presume, and Jan's just now old enough to want to suffer."

"She'll suffer," he said.

"Because of cruel us," said Willie. "Resign yourself to being an ogre, Pete. Best thing for her. She can take it out on us until a new face comes along." Willie shrugged. "Interesting boy," she rattled on. "Quite a flexible vocabulary. Of course he was angry, and one's vocabulary does swell up at such a time. Did you notice how rhythmical his emotion was?"

"Naturally; it was pure emotion," he agreed glibly. He was grateful to Willie. It was comforting to talk. "He couldn't accept our point of view, intellectually, bound up as it was in his own disappointment." He frowned. He saw his wife's thin shoulders shake. There in her deep chair, Willie was shuddering. "What's the matter?"

"I wonder if he didn't state my position quite shrewdly," she murmured. "My charming despair."



"Did you mind that?" he said, astonished.

"Ah, well, so long as it's charming," said Willie in her mocking way. "What are they doing out there, Pete? Embracing?"

"He's halfway down the hill," Pete said. "I can't see—no, she isn't with him."

They listened. There was no sound, no cry.

When Jan came in at last, Willie said sharply, "Go wash your face."

But Jan said in a clear voice, "You'll be relieved to know that he refuses to marry me until I am of age."

"I am relieved." Willie was frank.

"Yes," said her father, "yes, baby, that's better."

"Darling," said Willie, "don't say it. We all know you'll be of age in April. Meantime, wash your face, do! . . . Mix us a drink all around, Pete. And let us be civilized."

"Mix one for you," said Jan. She moved across the room toward the bedroom wing. "You two can settle down, all cozy, and analyze ——" Her voice broke on the last word, but she kept walking. She went to be alone. They would not be admitted, her resolute back explained, for they could not enter into her thought or the meaning of her life.

In the big room, now almost in twilight, her father mixed two drinks. Willie sat on her foot in the chair.

"Is there a door open," she said irritably, "or have I got the creeps, or what?"

He said stupidly, "Maybe there's a door open."

This October afternoon the countryside blazed softly with the season. Yellows and reds on the far hills were blended down by the blue autumn haze. Across the picture, the pin oak's lacy leaves still hung, now parchment brown. But inside the farmhouse, Willie Peterson was paying the lovely view no attention at all.

The house was rather violently out of order. In the middle of the big main room stood Willie's wardrobe trunk, half packed.

The longer we dwell on our misfortunes, the greater is their power to harm us. —VOLTAIRE.

Dresses and coats lay over the backs of chairs. Crumpled balls of brown paper, from the cleaners, were scattered on the floor. There were dirty dishes on the alcove table and the ash trays were overflowing, the fireplace was a mess of discarded combustibles.

Willie worked alone. She wore an old pair of gray-flannel slacks, a striped jersey, flat moccasins. Her face was none too clean and her dark hair was mussed.

When the phone rang, she snatched at it. "Oh, Anne, yes, darling. . . . Busy? My dear, I am going mad!" Willie's voice carried the fashionable woe. "Oh, the dumb help walked out on me. I'm absolutely high and dry." The phone made sympathetic noises. "I know," wailed Willie. "Two days ago. My jewel, my Mrs. Hall, just up and left. Oh, they will, whenever it's good and inconvenient. . . . No, darling, thanks. There's nothing in the world you can do. I don't intend to clean the house, mind you. Pete's coming up tonight and he can hire it done. . . . He must meet with some real-estate people. Besides, he's bringing me my wherewithal. To get to Reno. . . . Seems money's so necessary. . . . Oh, in the morning, as planned. . . . Believe me, if I ever get out of here and on that lovely train I shall batten myself down with cream on my face and go into a coma." Willie held the earpiece carelessly, only half listening to the words that poured out of it. "Yes," she said, "yes, in a couple of months. . . . Yes, dear, and thanks for calling."

She put the phone down, sighed and gathered a bunch of clothing in her arms. Her back was to the door. Some sound made her whirl, and there was Jan.

"What are you doing here!" screeched Willie. She made fending-off motions. "Go away! Go back to school!"

"For heaven's sakes," said Jan mildly. She came in, moving slowly. She wore a demure navy suit. She had a small overnight bag in her hand.

"You gave me a turn!" said Willie, dropping the clothes. "Now see here, what is this?"

"You could wash a cup, Willie," said Jan, with a strange little thread of pity.

Willie made tea and somehow went right on packing too. It was half an hour later that their heads turned at the sound of a car outside.

"Who drove in?" said Jan. "Maybe that's Mrs. Hall."

WILLIE strode to the window. "If it isn't Ethel! Now what!" She grabbed at her hair, rolled her eyes in comment on the state of the room, and then put on a company manner as quickly and neatly as one might pull down a blind. She faced the door. "Why, Ethel, darling, how nice to see you!" Then she and the plump little woman in dove gray and pearls were exchanging a fashionable cheek rubbing. "But," said Willie in charming confusion, "everything's so upset. I'm leaving in the morning, you know."

"I don't want to alarm you," said Ethel, in a voice of doom. "Janice, dear, how nice that you are here. I thought of that. I sent a wire to you at school. But of course you won't get it, now. I simply dropped everything."

Willie cut through. "What's happened to Pete?"

"He was in no fit state to come alone," said Ethel. "No. 'No,' I said, 'Neil shall drive you and I shall come along myself.'"

"Is Pete out there?"

Jan said, "Dad," and ran out the door.

"Wilhelmina, you will have to be very mature and understanding. You won't go to Reno now, of course. As I said to Peter, I am perfectly willing to do all that is necessary. I intend to stand by. But I will not pay your fare to Reno for a purpose of which I disapprove."

"What on earth's the matter?" said Willie lightly. "Pete, you look terrible."

"You see!" cried Ethel. "Wasn't I right not to let him come alone?"

Nobody heard her. Pete's big body filled the door. Jan, beside him, had her arms around him, but he didn't seem to know it. His face was grayish.

"Spit it out," said Willie quietly.

"Ben Jay's quit."

"Quit?"

"Folded up," he told her. "Business doesn't exist."

"Well?" she drawled.

"I have no income."

"Surely that's temporary," said Willie scornfully.

He didn't answer. He went across the room as if he walked in the dark and had to grope his way.

"My dear," chirped Aunt Ethel, "you must understand, as I do. It was the shock. In a few weeks or months, everything will look quite different. I said to Peter—and in the meantime, of course, dear Wilhelmina, there is nothing to worry about, for I am standing by. Am I not, Peter?"

"Be quiet," said Willie.

"Don't." Her husband held up his hand, wincing. "Aunt Ethel is going to take us in. Sweet of her." He crumpled into a chair.

"I do feel," said Ethel, "it would be stupid to keep up your rather elaborate apartment, my dear, when the third floor at my house is not in use."

NEXT MONTH

"The search for a soul begins when our eyes open, and closes only when they close."

YET, though the search is unending, our life's goal is unconsciously settled in childhood. Distinguished British-American novelist Phyllis Bottome has applied well-understood principles of psychology to her own life in her newest book.

The love of a mother who escaped life through imagined invalidism, of a father who loved life but did not understand children, and of a jealous and beautiful older sister formed an indelible mold for the author's future.

But Willie sailed across the cluttered room and stood over Pete, taut and demanding. "Pete, are you broke—flat? Is that it?"

"I haven't got a hundred dollars free and clear."

"Nothing socked away, h'm?" said Jan brightly. She was excited.

"What I've got will cover what I owe—maybe," he said.

"I don't get this scene at all," said Willie rather angrily. "So Ben Jay Wilcox has folded up. You are out of a job. And you haven't got any money. Right? Why is that such a calamity, Pete?" Now Willie crouched down to look up into his face. "You've got credit. Why, for instance, does Ethel have to take us in?"

He made a feeble effort to smile because he could see that she was only asking. "Spent twenty years," he mumbled, "sewing myself up with Wilcox instruments. Time I'd rather have been playing them myself. Now, no more."

"Are you so tied to Ben Jay's apron strings that you're worthless in the open market?"

"Nearly," he said. "Willie, I can't . . . I'm old . . . not what he paid me. Never again."

She folded in her lower lip and bit it.

"Man spends his life," he went on mumbling, "working up the patter. All of a sudden, doesn't mean a thing. Lived too high, too high. Can't afford Reno . . . alimony."

"Cheer up," chirped Ethel. "Dear people, you shall never want, not actually. And Janice must continue her education. I am prepared to go on with her allowance. There now! It isn't so bad, is it? I said to Peter when he came to me ——"

Willie interrupted. "You went to her? What's wrong with you, Pete? What is it?"

"Don't know," he said. "Sunk."

"It can't be that bad."

"Yes, it can." He roused. She must understand. "Taken me three days to realize. It's the truth, though. I'm about as bare of financial prospects as if I'd just got out of school. I can get a job selling, maybe. Selling something. But I'll never support all, we've had. Or you, Willie—your place in town. There isn't a thing I can do, Willie, that will bring it in." He said, almost hysterically, "It's gone, I tell you. Like smoke. Incredible. Ben Jay gives up. I never thought of that. Tied myself to him. Big man. I was the jackal. I was worth it—to him. But he's gone, doesn't need me, can't use me. The whole thing—should have seen it coming. But I didn't."

"Pete," said Jan, in a high excited voice, "you own this farm, don't you? And the taxes are paid?"

"If it brings what I put into it, and it won't. Willie, I'm sorry." He tried to rally himself. "You don't know how it took the ground from under me."

Aunt Ethel moved some clothing with a fastidious little hand and she sat down, crossing her plump ankles, fixing her smile. "The third floor," she said, "is really very comfortable. But it is strange. The walls of that house are quite soundproof, but somehow the floors do echo in a queer way. When one walks, you know? I rest, ordinarily, from one to three. And of course I don't find myself able to make long evenings any more. Still, you are quite welcome. Any sacrifice on my part —— You know you are welcome, don't you?"

Someone knocked on the door. It was Ada, in decent black. Jan flew to let her in. She said in her ordinary voice. "Excuse me. Thought I might's well get my things while Joe was around with his car."

Willie turned. She dropped what she was doing and went quickly across the crowded floor, holding out her hands. "Mrs. Hall, please believe I hadn't realized your trouble. I'm terribly sorry if I seemed stupid and self-centered. I was, of course, and I am ashamed."

Ada touched Willie's hand briefly. "Why, never mind, Miz Peterson." Her blue eyes were steady. "He had to go, I guess." She looked around the wild scramble of the place. "I'll neaten this here up for you, if you want. It'll finish out my week. Got the time, I might's well have the money."

The words bounced on silence.

"Oh, forgive me," cried Willie. "Aunt Ethel, may I present Mrs. Hall?"

Ada said, "How do?" She started for the kitchen. As she came to the alcove she quite mechanically began to gather up the dirty dishes. Ethel's brows climbed on her pink powder-frosted brow.

"Mrs. Hall has been cooking for us all summer," said Willie.

"Mrs. Hall is going to be my mother-in-law," said Jan merrily. "Something's happened," she cried to Ada. "I've got the perfect solution. You did mean it, didn't you?"

"Ayah," said Ada. "I meant it, Jan."

"Pete, Pete, listen." Jan ran back, to crouch before him as Willie had done. "Give me this farm."

"What? What's that, honey?"

"You could, couldn't you? It belongs to you? You said it wouldn't bring much. Instead of tuition—Pete, please!"

"What are you talking about?" said Willie.

"I'm not going back to school," said Jan. "I hate it. Now I don't even have to fight about it. Mrs. Hall's got a job, a factory job, in Stratford. And I could too. I'm young and healthy and I know they'd take me. And we could live here. Don't you see?"

"Who can?" said Willie.

"Mrs. Hall and me! Willie, she's lost her house. She'd have to take a room, if she could find one, and it's almost impossible. And I asked her, if I went, too, if she'd look after me. She promised Cy, so she said she would. We'll make oodles of money, the two of us, and we can use the station wagon—can't we, Pete? And we'd be just fine!"

He who gives when he is asked has waited too long. —BLAKE.

"What," said Ethel in a polite little scream, "is the child thinking of!"

"And besides," cried Jan as if this would make them all see the light at once, "it's a place for Cy to come home!"

Pete stirred. "Honey, you're welcome to anything I've got left in the world, but ——"

Ada said quietly, "If you wouldn't feel right about Jan living with me, Mr. Peterson, I wish you'd say so."

"Why, I think I would, Mrs. Hall," said Pete as if it surprised him. "I think she'd be fine with you. It's ——"

"There!" cried Jan.

"Not so fast," said Willie. "Not quite so fast. Please." Her green eyes took in that mottled red on Ethel's cheeks. "Sit still, Ethel dear, and let's us get to the bottom of this young and fairly wild idea. Suppose you sit down, Mrs. Hall. Now, in the first place, Jan, your education ——"

"I'm going to marry Cy," said Jan promptly and boldly. "I need a different kind of education."

Ethel said, "Mercy!"

Pete said, "Oh, honey."

But Willie said coolly, "Yes, I think you could learn some things you need to know. Suppose, under these circumstances, you do try earning your living, in a factory. That's one way to knock the glamour out of it. Now tell me, how are you going to manage a full-time job, fifteen miles away, and live here?"

"Oh, we can shop on the way home and there'd only be breakfast and dinner. My goodness, we can make the beds and that stuff before we leave." Jan had dreamed it instantly in all detail.

"Do you think it's feasible, Mrs. Hall?"

"Get up at six, you can do a lot," Ada said rather stubbornly.

"You can collapse, too," Willie murmured. She chewed her lip. "However, if, for instance, Mrs. Hall would be willing to stay on here and keep the house and if you could get another girl to go in with you—then ——"

"Forty-six-fifty a week, while I'm learning," said Ada briefly.

"I beg your pardon," said Willie with respect. "But look here, unless the two of you could hire someone ——"

THAT is an important fact for you to remember when you market — because it has been conclusively proved that fresh vegetables lose health-giving vitamins at an alarming rate while in the store — unless they are constantly protected with ice.

Here are some of the startling losses disclosed by extensive research by the Biochemistry Departments of 16 leading universities: Spinach loses nearly half its essential Vitamin C in 8 hours unless iced—lettuce 22 per cent! Fresh asparagus loses 19 per cent in only 6 hours!

Don't waste good money on wilted, dried-out, vitamin-starved vegetables. Don't risk family health. Buy only where produce is bedded in pure, sparkling crushed ice to keep it really garden-fresh and vitamin-rich—crisp, delicious and fully nutritious.

"Who?" said Ada.

"Ah," said Willie, "who? I think, Jan, you'd better forget it, although it would have been an experience for you. Better take Aunt Ethel up on her very kind offer."

"No, mother! I couldn't stand it!"

Behind Willie, Ethel began to struggle up. Willie said, not turning her head, "If Ethel wasn't the saint she is, she'd have slapped your face long ago." Ethel, wearing a sudden halo, sank back again. "Now, Jan, come, think it out. There's no heat to speak of. There's winter ——"

"Mrs. Hall never had central heating and she's lived a long time."

"Might bring up my parlor stove," said Ada calmly.

Pete said suddenly, blinking as if he were awakening, "What are we talking —— No, no, honey. Too risky. Fires have to be tended. You can't manage."

"Maybe we'll have to manage," said Jan softly. Her hand flicked a little gesture at Ethel's flushed and outraged silence.

Pete swung out of his chair. He was alarmed. "Why, Aunt Ethel understands. It was an impulse, but you hadn't thought it through. Aunt Ethel's not petty, you know. Never worry about that."

Ethel's mean little eyes slid around.

"I wonder," said Willie. She had her arms folded, head turned, chin on her shoulder.

"What, Willie? What?" Jan brought her own hands together in hope.

"Have you any indigent female relative up your sleeve," said Willie with her eyes on Ada, "who'll come and do the dirty work for a roof over her head?"

"Know what you mean," said Ada, nodding. "Like Cousin Ella."

"That's the stuff!" said Willie. "Now, where is Cousin Ella?"

"Was in the Army," said Ada. "She's not what she used to be."

Willie bit her lips and made deep dimples in her cheeks. Her green eyes were dancing.

"Isn't there somebody?" Jan begged, but Ada shook her head. "Can't we advertise, then? There must be somebody, somewhere in the world—somebody like that!"

WILLIE unwound her arms. "Well"—her eyes slipped over Ethel, that puffed pigeon with the tight pink mouth, over Pete's bent shoulders, around the room, the mess—"as a matter of fact, there is. There's me."

"Willie, you can't keep house!"

"How do I know?" said Willie flippantly. "I've never tried."

"Do I understand ——" said Ethel, her voice curdling in her throat.

"Willie, honestly." Jan was wailing. "Not you!"

"For a roof over my head? Oh, don't you think so?" Willie looked wicked. "Now, let us be frank. We've lost our dough. Pete gives up. He can't support us. You're going to work, but you need a housekeeper. I need a roof."

"Am I a phantom?" cried Ethel, beating her satin breast.

"Ethel, dear, if you only were!" purred Willie. "But, frankly, if I had to inhabit your third floor, tiptoe, the way you'd have it, I should go mad. Since we are all going mad, anyhow, I'd rather do it in a freer way."

"Willie," said Jan breathlessly, "you might get a job in Stratford."

"Me, on an assembly line?" Willie bared her teeth. "I may be crazy, but not that crazy. No, I want this job." She swung on Ada. "How about it?"

"Sorry to hear you folks had trouble," said Ada nervously. "But this wasn't any part of the bargain, Jan, and I dunno ——"

"Let me point out to you, Ada Hall," said Willie, "I'll be far less in your hair than you've been in mine. You'll be out of here all day. Now listen. With no nonsense about sisterly love, I'll guarantee to feed you, keep the home fires burning, and put out your slippers every night. Speak up, now. Or will you turn me out into the storm?"

"Oh, Willie"—Jan melted—"if you really want to."

Ada folded and unfolded her long lips. "This is share and share alike on the expenses, Jan and me," she said dourly.

"And on the authority," said Willie quickly. "I realize that."

"Well, I guess —— This here's your place. We'll see stranger things before we die," said Ada rather helplessly.

"Oh! Oh!" Jan pirouetted.

But Ethel was up now. She was moving toward the door. "Come along, Peter," she said. "It seems we made our generous plans for nothing."

"Wait," said Pete. "Where am I going?" He looked utterly dazed.

"You are going with me," his aunt said. "There are things to be settled."

"Which are settled," flounced Ethel.

"No, wait. I'm not going with you, Aunt Ethel." He ran his hands through his hair. "Wait a minute. I can get a job for myself. For myself, it's a cinch! What do I care what I do or for how much? I can do anything. I can live. It was the ——"

"Burden?" said Willie.

"Willie, are you going to do this? Am I ——"

"Released," she said. Her eyes were cold. "I've left your bed and board, if that's what you're asking. You are not responsible for any debts but your own."

"I am leaving," gasped Aunt Ethel, "and I shall not come again." Ethel was fading out the door. Pete stumbled after her, protesting, explaining.

There was silence in the room.

"So," said Willie. She kicked the ball of brown paper lightly. Ada Hall, quite mechanically, began to move, to bend to pick it up. But suddenly she stiffened her back. She straightened. She looked at Willie Peterson with her calm blue eyes. Willie looked back and her face was convulsed for a moment with a flash of rueful mirth. Then Willie bent down and picked the paper off the floor.

"Well," said Ada dryly, "for Jan's sake and all, we'll make a stab at it."

"Ayah," said Willie.

But Jan, hand at her throat, turned from the window. "Willie, think—quick," she whispered. "There goes a whole kind of life, manicures and teas. Willie, you won't like this! You can stop her. Go out and grovel and weep and you can have it back. Dishes and brooms! That's not for you, Willie. You can't stand it. Don't be a fool!"

"I'll thank you to shut up," said Willie.

"All right. Listen," Jan said loudly. "I won't have any dropping the work on Mrs. Hall. I mean it, Willie. If you think you can just live here—mother, you can't. So if you don't intend to keep your bargain, you'd better back out, fast. This is my farm now. And I'm on Cy's side, mother. I'm in the world you said I couldn't live in. Hurry up, she's going! Neil's backing the car."

"Small fry," said Willie gently, "I've been in this vale of tears twenty years before you were born, and I've been through more in my day than you ever heard of. I will not go and be Ethel's tame cat, and you can shut your trap. If I don't like it here, I can lump it or leave it, but not now. And furthermore, you can give me your respect, please. You don't know the servant problem, sweetheart!" Willie was rolling, her hands were flying. "You don't understand! I am the high cockalorum that rules the roost and cracks the whip! I," cried Willie with a flourish, "am the cook!"

She went over and closed the trunk with one fierce heave. She swooped on the chairs and gathered up armfuls. The farmhouse stopped dissolving. Abruptly, it changed direction. It solidified. The roof settled firmly down. Willie flashed around.

Pete stood in the door. "I'm sorry about Reno," he said painfully. "Maybe, later ——"

"Don't give it a thought," trilled Willie. "After all, if our hearts are pure, we can be divorced in the sight of God!" She seemed ti, all across, that made a barrier against th old distances. Besides, Ada's fat iron wa stove with isinglass panes was glowing e corner and there was a warm wool carpet, rescued from the town apartment, on the floor. In the center of the room stood the dining table from town, delicate mahogany, meant for formality. It was covered with coarse blue-and-white stuff, and in the very center stood a tumbler full of teaspoons, New England style. There were on it, besides, three plates, three cups, three forks, all licked clean. But these dishes had not yet been washed.

Shelves near the fireplace, which used to hold a very few subtly placed pieces of pottery, were now crammed to overflowing with books and papers. The bar was bare, except for salt and pepper shakers. Logs were stacked near the hearth, on a mat of old newspapers, not a foot from the damask of the town bred sofa. An old Morris chair, in yellow oak and faded red velvet, wildly incongruous with everything else in the room, took a place of honor.

In an old blue sweater and skirt, her hair tied with a blue ribbon, Jan was sitting cross-legged on the floor near the stove. She had a pad of paper and a pen in her hands, but she wasn't writing much down.

Ada, in her husband's Morris chair, was mending, but her mind wasn't on it. She kept darting nervous glances at the table. Finally she put her work aside, she got to her feet, she moved almost furtively.

"Ah, ah!" said Jan. "Better not!"

"Where is she?" said Ada in exasperated tones.

"She's got some complicated deal. It probably takes a lot of talking."

Ada sniffed. "I'm just going to pick them up," she said defiantly.

"You'll catch it, if you do."

"Weekdays, I don't mind," said Ada, "but come Sunday, Jan, I —— Them dishes are the worst. I wish she'd let me wash the dishes. There's only the six. That's what she's cut us down to."

Jan said, "You didn't hear her last night. She said now that we use only six dishes per meal, we have enough to last a whole week. She said maybe if she had only one day for washing dishes, it would be better for the dishes. She said if you wash them every day you tend to use the same ones over and over. She said it was the same principle as cross-switching your tires."

"I can't," said Ada, "stand no more of her days. Never cooks but Saturday and Monday. Never cleans but Wednesday."

"Honestly, Ada, you'd save wear and tear on yourself if you'd stop worrying about how she does it. It's unorthodox, but we eat. Don't we?"

"Then she sits and reads!" exploded Ada.

"Because she's studying," said Jan patiently. "She works hard when she does work. It's just different, Ada."

Ada sniffed. This type of sniff Jan took, quite peacefully, for an affectionate sound. She doodled on the margin of her paper.

"I'm agoing to grab the chance while she's out and wash my stockings," said Ada. "You got any?"

"One pair," said Jan without protest. She dreamed, gazing at the little orange panes of the stove. She heard the car. "Hiya, Roger," she called over her shoulder, letting him open the door for himself. "You're getting to be a Sunday institution, just like the funny papers."

"Say, thanks," he drawled. "Fact is, I've got a chore in the valley." He took off his overcoat. "How are you, baby? Where's Willie?"

"Out. Schemes, she's got."

"What?" said Roger eagerly. "What's she up to now? Never mind, don't tell me. She'll be back, won't she?"

"Oh, sure. Pretty soon."

"Sure is cozy in here, in a mad kind of way," said Roger, looking around him. "Where's Ada?"

Jan told him with a motion of her head.

"What do you hear from Cy?"

"Not much," she said sadly.

"Aw, poor kid. But mail's a funny thing, you know. Probably someday you'll get a whole pack of stuff, all at one time. How's the job?"

"All right. I like it. I really do. It's only on Sundays I have time to get a little droopy."

"Honey, you droop all you want," he said sympathetically. "Tell me, what did I miss? What's been going on this week, h'm?"

Jan sighed. "Oh, now it's biodynamics," she told him. "Willie says she's going to raise food for the whole year by planting it on the sides of little hills."

"What?"

"I dunno. You take an acre and you corrugate it. So you have twice as much area."

"Why doesn't she just take two acres?"

"Because then you'd have to walk twice as far with a hoe and stuff."

"Uh-huh!" crowed Roger.

"She's got Ada's hair standing on end as usual. Ada says it's agin nature. Willie says it's not at all. It's agin Ada's ancestral prejudices. Ada thinks you ought to suffer. And Willie doesn't see why, if you can figure out how not to."

"They conflict," said Roger happily. "You don't take sides, do you?"

"I keep the peace," said Jan. "But I favor Ada's way. I try. I work as hard as I can." Her face was smooth and serious.

"And think all the time about your boy," said Roger tenderly. He thought, She's got herself right where she wants herself. "Well, I tend to be pro-Willie, y'know."

"Yes, I know," said Jan.

He saw that she did know. She was ahead of him. They heard Willie coming.

"Ah!" said Roger, without meaning to.

WILLIE bounced in at the front door. She was wearing heavy wool pants, a plaid wool shirt, a disreputable mackintosh of a different and clashing plaid. Her hair was tied up in a bandanna. She let the mackintosh fall on the floor. She stripped off the bandanna and heaved at her hair with both hands. "Boy, howdy, did I do a deal!" she chortled. "Don't anyone speak! Lemme write it down before I forget!" She rummaged on the shelves, fishing out paper and pencil and some large notebooks. She plopped all this on the table and sat down before it.

Roger came drifting to a spot behind her. "What goes, Willie?" he murmured.

"Milton Conrad," said Willie in precise tones, making notes as she spoke, "gives Elijah Gray the use of his tractor plow. So Lije plows his own fields and an acre for me."

"Why?" said Roger.

"Oh, he feels good. Conrad would [illegible] him the tractor last year, but I fixed [illegible] naturally Lije wants to do me a fav[illegible]

"How did you fix it?"

"Well, old man Peabody gives Con[illegible] days' labor in April."

"Yeah?"

"Now, I give Peabody three l[illegible] manure to pay for the labor. Which [illegible] from Laverne Wilmerding. Laverne [illegible] me four loads of manure because I [illegible] so Conrad swaps him a tire he's got t[illegible] for a mess of poults."

"What's them?"

"Itty-bitty turkeys, you ignoramu[illegible]

"Yeah, but Willie ——"

"So I come out with my acre plow[illegible] one load of manure."

"Listen, you got something for n[illegible] there. You can't ——"

"I did not! Who did all the manipu[illegible] I'd like to know?"

"Yeah, but you can't do that!"

WILLIE slapped the paper with a flat[illegible] "Take a look. Tell me who gets g[illegible] Tell me that!" She went to pick [illegible] mackintosh and hang it on a purely[illegible] tional nail driven in the side wal[illegible] stuffed the bandanna into the sleeve. [illegible] all, it took me all day!" She move[illegible] the table. Her hands mechanically ga[illegible] up the six dishes and the silverwar[illegible] took them off to the kitchen.

Ada, sloshing rinsing water over a l[illegible] socks and stockings in the dishpan, ob[illegible] braced herself.

"Nearly through?" said Willie with [illegible] sweetness. "I'd like to wash these."

"One second," sa[illegible] She began to squee[illegible] the water betwee[illegible] palms faster than [illegible] meant to.

Willie leaned with[illegible] gerated patience [illegible] cupboards. The [illegible] pounced. "Nobody," she said acidly, [illegible] you to wash any pair of socks for me[illegible]

"I happened to feel like it," muttere[illegible]

"Pity you can't learn to control th[illegible] pulses," jeered Willie. "Besides, they w[illegible] dirty. It's a mere superstition tha[illegible] have to wash cotton socks every day, [illegible] do wash your feet. Cotton is not comp[illegible] to silk or nylon."

"No harm done," said Ada loftily. [illegible] furthermore, I'm going to hang the [illegible] here."

"Which is stupid," said Willie pro[illegible] "Fifteen minutes on the line b[illegible] stove ——"

"I won't do it. Looks bad on Sun[illegible]

"Better it should look bad for fiftee[illegible] utes than flop around here wet for t[illegible] four hours."

"I'm going to hang them out here, ju[illegible] same."

"O.K." Willie shrugged. "You're the[illegible]

"Ayah," said Ada gloomily.

Willie washed the six dishes in a twir[illegible] running hot water on them from t[illegible] and scrubbing them with a soapy brus[illegible] put them in a wire drainer. She dri[illegible] hands.

Roger got out of the chair. "Say, [illegible] come on. Ride down the valley wit[illegible] I've got a chore."

"Seems to me," said Willie, "you'[illegible] an awful suspicious lot of chores in these[illegible] on Sundays."

"I manipulate," he grinned.

"You go, Jan." Willie was careless.

Roger opened his mouth and clo[illegible] again. Jan looked up from her pad. "[illegible] I'd just as soon not.

"Go on. Fresh air. Bright eyes. [illegible] cheeks." Willie was pawing her noteb[illegible]

"Don't be ridiculous. I've had my quota of running around. I've got to map out my planting chart."

"Listen, Willie, you did that two weeks ago."

"I get better and better ideas."

"Turning into a mania," he grumbled. "You've got the queerest look in your eye."

"Ah," said Willie. "But now I've got manure!" She chewed her pencil. "It makes it all seem so real, somehow," she said dreamily. "Roger, dear—know what?"

"What?"

"I'm going to make money! This racket"—she pounded her notes—"is a gold mine today. Food! Comes up out of the ground! Astonishing! I'm going to start small, but before I get through —— Go away. I've got ideas. Don't bother me."

"She's barmy," said Roger sadly. "Come on, Jan. Don't make me go alone."

"Is it very cold?" said Jan, scrambling up.

"Bundle up, chickabiddy," he told her.

When the bedroom door swung shut behind her, Roger felt his heart take a sick leap. He moved closer to the tousled bent dark head.

"Listen, Willie, leave the beans be a minute, please," he pleaded. "Did you know Pete's in Stratford?"

"Um-hum," she said, unsurprised. "He called up. He's coming over."

Roger said desperately, "What's with you and Pete? Tell me. Honest, Willie."

"I dunno," said Willie, taking off her glasses. "Why?"

"Because if you get around to a legal divorce, I ——"

"We couldn't afford it," she said vaguely. "We ——" She looked back down at the catalogues spread out before her on the table. And then her head bent with sudden alertness. "What!"

"Yah, I—I want you and me to get hitched," said Roger awkwardly.

The courteous learns his courtesy from the discourteous.

Willie tilted her head back and stared up at him. "Why?"

"All right. Don't yell," he said nervously. "I'll tell you why. Because you're the most amusing woman I've ever known in my life. Because I can't keep away from here. And I'm not going to let you go for want of asking."

"Roger, I'm . . . flabbergasted."

"You've been the grandest sport in the world," he stammered. "Don't think I don't know it. Your antics are wonderful! But I'm in the dough now, Willie, and when you get tired—you're wonderful, but when you get bored with this stuff, I'd be happy to have you."

"Bored?" she said. She smiled. "Roger, dear." She wasn't, he made sure, mocking.

"And don't you say I'm half your age," he put in quickly. "I'm only two years younger. That's absolutely all. Don't say a word. Think—think it over. Give it a chance, will you, Willie?" He turned his back and walked toward the stove.

HE heard her say softly, "You've made me want to bawl." He swung around. But she was smiling.

And Jan was ready. "Ah," said Roger quickly, "got your mittens? Well, we'll push off and be back shortly. So long."

Willie was staring thoughtfully at the stove. Roger closed his eyes a brief moment, as if in prayer. He felt as if he'd jumped off the high board and hadn't yet hit the water. He pushed Jan ahead of him, out the door.

"She went, eh?" said Ada.

Willie was drowned in a sea of papers and didn't answer. Ada sat down in the Morris chair and picked up her work. Although she said no more, her posture, the set of her mouth, the very movement of her eyes radiated disapproval.

Suddenly Willie looked up and slid her spectacles down her nose. "H'm," she said. "What? Who? What's the matter?"

Ada's feet tapped the floor.

"You got no call to spread your ill feathers," Willie said.

"Jan's got no call to be running around with that Roger Lane. Out here every day."

"Don't be silly!"

"A woman's promised to a man, she better keep her mind onto him."

"Roger Lane," said Willie deliberately, "is thirty-five years old. And furthermore"—she put on an air of great reasonableness—"for the sake of argument, suppose Jan is fond of Roger? If we tell her she mustn't, then it's going to assume an importance it might not otherwise."

THIS kind of reasoning made no dent on Ada. "If she don't run around with him, how's she going to find out she likes him?"

"Uh-huh. What you don't know won't hurt you, eh?" said Willie thoughtfully. "Oh, Ada, discipline's discipline, but in a case out of love, for instance, you fall!"

"I dunno's I believe that," said Ada flatly. "And if it was so, no use running around looking for a banana peel, is they?"

"Let us," said Willie, "retire to our position of armed neutrality. What say?"

"Ayah," said Ada.

Willie doodled on the papers. "Let's here." She turned again in the chair. "What do you think I ought to do about Roger?"

"Tell him to stay away."

"I'm not going to do it," said Willie immediately. "I am very fond of Roger. I ask him to stay for supper. I'll ask him to stay over, if he likes."

"Where you going to put him?"

"In the old maid's room," defied Willie. "Right out there with all those things of Cy's. Right there in the shrine!"

"You're tempting Providence," said Ada.

"You don't know what I'm tempting.' Willie twisted her mouth. "Anyhow," she grumbled, "a man—any man who wants to hang around this female paradise, this hennery! I'm tired of cooking for women! You don't inspire me!"

"Wasn't aiming to," said Ada.

Pete Peterson, watching for the icy place, drove the rented car carefully up the hill. He parked it, got out and took a deep breath of the frosty air. The beauty of the winter prospect wrung a response from his senses even as he went quickly along the snowy path to the door.

Willie flung it open. "Hiya, Pete!" And there she was, after five months. She was unkempt, which seemed strange. And her face was different. There were more lines. There was more color. It looked, he thought with a shock, weather-beaten. Willie kissed him.

Pete took another good hard look at her, though he could read nothing in the friendly green eyes. "You look in the pink. Something agrees with you." He blinked at the room. "Hello, there, Mrs. Hall. You're looking well too."

"I'm feeling fine, Mr. Peterson," said Ada pleasantly. "And how are you?"

"Fine. Just fine."

There was a kind of verbal paralysis. Willie with her old malice, let it linger too long.

Pete said, "Yup. Sheer curiosity got the better of me."

And Willie laughed. "Well, take off your coat, then, and tell us all. Jan's gone for a little ride with Roger. She'll soon be back."

"How is she?"

"Thriving."

"You look very comfortable." He was taking in the changed aspect of the room.

"Oh, we're snug as three bugs in a rug, we are," said Willie. "What's this news?"

"A job," he said. "About time too."

"Where are you working, Mr. Peterson?" inquired Ada.

"Stratford," he said. "Surprised?"

"Since when?" Willie made her brows fly.

"Since a week. I found a little niche, I think."

"I bet you floundered around some, didn't you?" said Willie shrewdly. "How's Ethel?"

"Oh, Ethel's off of us forever. Changed her will, I'm afraid."

"That's a pity. But the price was high."

"It was pretty high," he said.

She sat down in the straight chair at the table, hugged the back of it, with her chin on her arms, and her face was bright and interested. "Go on."

"I floundered, all right," he told her. "Tried working with my hands. Was I a flop! Tried out the old back muscles. I was terrible! You seem to need something over and above mere muscle."

"Ayah," said Ada, with animation, "folks think work like, say, farming is just plain hard work. Anybody can do it. But it ain't. There's a knack to it."

Pete saw Willie's chin go up, saw but did not understand the flash of defiance in her eye. "So never mind," purred Willie, "if you're not the seventh son of a seventh son of toil like some lucky people." Ada bridled. "So you went back to the department of the brain?"

"I am liaison," said Pete, leaning back. "I'm the one who sits in conference. Who wastes the time. I'm the one who takes people to lunch. I'm the smoother, the soother, the one who says 'yes' to both sides and makes it stick. Not much of a job. But it seems I serve a purpose."

"People are dumb," said Willie surprisingly. "They don't seem to be able to figure out a deal for mutual advantage unless somebody needles them into it. All they do is stand still in a deadlock and glare across the fence and mutter in their whiskers."

"When did you find that out?" He was amazed.

"Oh, I did a little liaison work myself today. For heaven's sakes, Pete, where is our hospitality? Let me fix you a drink."

"The bar's changed its looks, I see."

"We simply keep the ice handier."

"Mrs. Hall," said Pete, when Willie was out of the room, "who does the housework around here?"

"She does." Her blue eyes met his.

"Does she really?" said Pete in awe. He looked around. The room was clean and gay.

"Got her system," snorted Ada. She leaned toward him. "She's a terror! Much as your life is worth to have an impulse around here."

"What—what did you say?"

"I DON'T say I complain, mind you," continued Ada, "but I washed my dishes three times a day for forty year. Don't hardly seem like a meal's finished. Got her system, though." Her head wagged from side to side, and yet, in the depths of the blue eyes, something was dancing.

"How's about a little snort, Ada?" Willie came, offering. "Do you good."

"No, thanks," said Ada mildly. "I'm going to clean out my dresser drawers."

"That's your privilege," said Willie.

"One of them," said Ada. She went away.

"What have you been doing to her?" Pete was consumed with curiosity.

"She's an old die-hard!" said Willie indignantly. "She's encrusted with ancient ideas. A little liberalizing of the household arts isn't going to hurt her. Broaden her out. Here's to your job, Pete."

"To yours," he said. They drank, rather formally. "Doggone it," he said suddenly, "I'm a little miffed that you get along so swimmingly."

"How male of you!" drawled Willie. "Listen, if you want to contribute fifty cents, go ahead. We aren't so proud."

"Anything I can do ——" He leaped for the chance.

Willie said slowly, "But maybe we're proud. You know, there's a kind of fascination in 'making out,' as Ada says. Fully, making a living is a lot closer to what it is than I had thought. Pete"—her green eyes were honest—"are we really here to make our daily bread, and is all the higher, fine et cetera, just embroidery?"

"It's a thought, Willie," he said soberly.

"By gum," she said, "when you get your teeth into the real thing, such as do we or don't we, it has a flavor."

"It has," he said. He was trembling deeply, although no tremor reached the surface of his body. He felt as if he had stumbled into a long-lost place.

"WE must," said Willie in a high, bright voice, "sit down and have a good old-time analysis one day. I've nearly forgotten how to do it." Then she veered again. "Stay to supper," she begged warmly. "There's cold meat pie in the icebox all ready for the oven. For you, I'll open the pickles."

"I'd like to, Willie," he confessed.

"Good. I'll break out a clean napkin." She got up and walked across the floor.

He managed to speak in the old light tone. "What I really came to say, perhaps now, I could finance a modest inexpensive divorce, if you'd care to go ahead with that." She didn't look at her. He sensed when she turned.

"Why, that's wonderfully nice and thoughtful of you. As a matter of fact——" She stopped. She stood by the table. "Reno?" she asked.

He shrugged. I guess he supposed so.

"How the dickens can I get off for six or seven weeks?" cried Willie. "I can't do it," Pete. Not after the first of April. It's impossible!"

"Why?"

"Spring planting. The things I've got to do in April. Look here's a project ——"

"What's this?" he said stupidly. He got up and looked at the papers, at the charts she'd drawn. "Why that's beautiful!"

"You see"—her forefinger had a broken nail—"that's sweet corn. There are the pole beans. I figure them for the outside row. Now, the compost piles ——"

His eyes roved. He picked up another sheet. A series of figures, neatly computed, nicely organized. "What's this?"

"Oh, that's my estimate for canning. Overestimated, of course. If I get seventy-five per cent of that, I'll call it a triumph. And here, if I have any luck at all, is what I'm going to market."

He said wonderingly, "You sound like a blooming executive."

"H'm?" She hardly heard him. "I'm doing this over. I'm not satisfied. But look at the intercropping schedule. Isn't that fancy?"

"Amazing!" he said. "Willie, tell me who's going to do all this actual work?"

"Me, plus the unsophisticated labor of the Tinkham twins."

"Boys?"

"Girls. I've got no time to fight down tradition. I'm hiring me some girls who are innocent and unformed. Sharecroppers. I've gone back to barter, and it works to. I told Jan and Ada to stay outside the fence. Jan's too moony and Ada sniffs all the time. I've got the Tinkham girls all worked up. We are going to revolutionize the industry."

"Amazing," he repeated.

The phone rang. Pete watched her cross in her lithe long-legged stride. He hardly heard what she was saying. He was tasting his surprise. He was trying to understand. Then he was made aware, so well did he know the lines of Willie's body, that something was wrong. His ears alerted. He heard her say, "Yes, Mr. Burns, I'm quite sure " ou scared me so!" Jan said. Her pulse s pounding in her throat. It was quite s le. She drew in a long shaky breath.

" t . . . missing?"

"Far in the north, Jan," he murmured. Roger said, "I'm sorry to hear that."
"They don't know?" Jan said.
"The wire called it missing," her father told her gently. "But, sweetheart, it's . . . not so good, you know."
"Where is she? Where's Ada?" Jan went to the bedroom door. She stood there just an instant, her hand on the knob. Then she opened the door, quietly, and slipped inside.
"Maybe I ought to . . . get out of here?" Roger inquired. He felt lost.
"I wouldn't know," Pete said harshly. "Maybe you ought to stick around. How do you stand with Jan?"
"You got me wrong, Pete," said Roger awkwardly. "I'm afraid I'm kinda courting Willie these days. That is, if you —— I didn't know ——" His throat fluttered.

PETE heard himself saying in a light surprise, "Well, I'll be darned. She'd make you a handsome wife, Roger."
"She would. If she would."
"Well," said Pete rather irritably, "won't she?"
"Oh, be quiet," said Willie with that writhing motion of her head.
"Sorry. Wrong moment, of course," said Roger. "You need a drink, Willie." He bungled off to the kitchen. He seemed, even to himself, to be making a lot of noise getting the drink.
Willie said in a low, monotonous tone, "I'm not anywhere near her. 'Live and let live,' I said. Now I don't know what to do. I can't even hold her and smooth her hair."
"Well, I can!" Pete flamed.
Then Jan was there. He went quickly and thrust his arm where it would support her. But she straightened away from it. "Ada's doing wrong," she cried. "Mother, she's all wrong! She says she's going to leave here. She says she's alone, now, and there's no tie. And she'd only remind me. But what a coward! I never knew she was a coward!"
"Hush," said Willie. "Oh, hush, duck, hush."
"But she gives up!" cried Jan. "She's afraid. Afraid to hope. She always takes the hard way. But it's not because she's so darned brave. She won't risk anything."
"Won't she?" said Willie oddly.
"But Cy's not like that! He's got more nerve! He's not like that, I tell you. He isn't afraid of anything, not even hope. And I don't care where he is, he hasn't given up, unless he's dead." Pete winced. "She's got crust to give him up!" Jan cried. "Why, I wouldn't dare! Cy isn't mine to give. He's his own. He belongs to himself. And he'll always be trying." Her voice quavered. "Cy's darnedest is pretty darned good."
"Of course it is," said Pete. "Of course it is. Hush, hush."
"I don't feel him gone out of the world yet," said Jan pitiably.
Her father sobbed, "Hush, dear."
"Let her talk," said Willie with a glow in her green eyes.
"And I won't beat myself to believe it, just because that'll get the worst over with," Jan said. "Lots of people have been lost. Just . . . missing? They're looking, aren't they? And if it turns out false, all right. I'll take that blow when it comes. Not now. Not yet. Not when it's Cy."
"You're right," said Pete shakily. "You're . . . fine." He felt that this was terrible.
Willie said, "Don't fret about Ada. I'll talk to her."
Jan said in a sudden nervous rush, "Oh, gee, I only make forty dollars a week, and if Ada goes away . . . how can I? How can I keep his room?" Her mouth quivered. She seemed ready to fly into pieces over this detail.
"Easily fix that," said Pete hoarsely. "Why don't I take over? I need board and room, don't I? Got a job. Right in Stratford, honey. Seventy-five a week too."

In the evening would meet, drive home. Willie always ed to have been listening for them. The would swing open to the warmth and They were frozen, all the same.

What was happening—the efforts being made so far, far away—was like a dream. It was the nightmare, the one in which you run and run and gasp and try and cannot reach the goal.

From the sky, men saw where the wrecked plane was lying in the white wilderness.

Sometimes Jan would restate her stubborn hope, with the awful courage she'd taught herself, and Pete would add his heartbroken support. Ada said little. Willie was watchful and quiet. She ran the house without comment. Work was the saving grace for them all.

Every day it seemed a little colder.

LATE Friday night came the flash on the radio. Fourteen dead. Eight survivors. The wire came as they were listening. Cy had survived.

Jan went to pieces. Pete went out and walked in the snow for hours, lest he do the same. Ada shut herself away. In the morning she was quite composed. None of them could remember what Willie had said or done through that night. Sunday morning, however, she got out her planting charts.

They heard, in a day or two, about his feet. Frozen. Both. Amputated, below the knee.

March came and passed and April arrived. The fields emerged, dilapidated and muddy. Pete was still there, settled into the routine, in a neutral corner. The house was run according to Willie's system, which, he noticed, was far less rigidly fantastic than her preaching about it. But the running battle with Ada went merrily on. Pete would swap privately with Jan gleeful reports on one skirmish or another that had taken place.

To be occupied in what does not concern you is worse than doing nothing.
—BALTHASAR GRACIAN.

April wore on, and more than the house began to rock under Willie's attack. Slowly, miraculously, the level stretch below the house turned a soft brown. Every evening the turned earth seemed to bear more marks and lines until, at last, soft ridges fell all across in orderly beauty. As the sun went down and the workers returned, they would find Willie out of doors, leaning on the fence, gazing dreamily over the land. She would pull away, as if its fascination were a rubber band; she would come in and serve supper, and all the while they could feel how the land lay in her mind.

Pete did not know what else she might be thinking. He did not inquire. For, in a sense, the farmhouse held its breath. They worked. The routine went on. But actually, all this while, the farmhouse waited for Cy.

April was yielding to May and some small green was showing in the ground. Pete, as he got out of the car, thanked the parson, and turned to the door, squinted an eye at the field. He'd caught the habit from Willie. And it pleased him to see, each day, the tiny change, the subtle signs of growth. On the terrace, the great pin oak was budding. Even the far hills were faintly green and yellow.

Inside, the glass curtains were gone and spring lay handy to the eye. The room was shining clean. It had its best foot forward, all right. It looked lovely, he thought, standing with his bundles, feeling something rise in his throat. There were flowers everywhere, branches of blossoming trees Willie had persuaded to bloom indoors. And the whole house smelled of what was cooking. It was a festive smell, like Thanksgiving morning. Then Willie came in with an enormous bowl of jonquils in her arms.

Pete looked at her and swallowed. For Willie was wearing a dress. It was an old dress, a thin wool in soft blue. Her handsome legs were in silk. Her heels were high. Her hair was dressed sleekly. Her tanned face was rouged a little.

"You made it!" she cried, all smiles.

"Yup. Hitched a ride with the parson. I got the cream too."

"You're wonderful!" said Willie. She put her hands under his burdens. "What's this? Bananas! Oh, Pete!"

"You'd think they were orchids," he muttered. He let her have the packages. He shrugged off his topcoat.

"Just what I expected," she jeered scarcely bothering to lower her voice. "Blow in an hour before dinner and then start dressing!"

"You're not mad, Mama?" he asked.

"I don't think so," her voice came back. "I called the airport and he's due in."

"When?"

"Right now. They promise."

He stood the back of a chair with his palms. "You think Chet's there all right? You think I ought to drive over? Did you ask the girls?"

"Yes," said Willie. "Jo said no. Because he'll get here before they would meet him there. Chet's waiting." He spoke to him."

Pete rubbed his face. "Anything I can do? Mow flowers?"

There was Willie at the door with another load of the yellow stuff. "I got to picking them," she said childishly, "and I couldn't stop." He wondered if she knew she was a picture standing there in that blue with brave flowers. He wondered, very much, whether she knew. "I didn't see how there could be too many," said Willie with a sigh.

"Willie," said her husband suspiciously, "you look awful hefty female today."

"Certainly. I'm starting to look like a mother-in-law." She tripped to put the jonquils on the table.

"Then you're a dear," he said.

"A liar," she murmured. He dashed around to see if she was smiling. He thought her mouth was fighting a smile. He couldn't be sure. He thought, for the thousandth time in a week, I don't know.

"Get your things," said Willie, flapping her hands.

"What?"

"You'll have to take them out of his room."

"Oh," he said. "Yeah. Sure." He took a step. "Better put them out in the shed, had I? The so-called guesthouse?"

"Oh, no, it's too cold yet. Pete, you'd freeze."

"What will I do then?" He shoved his hands down in his pockets. He thought, Showdown, at last.

"We'll think of something before night falls," she said vaguely, caressing a blossom with her forefinger. "Hurry up. Up mustn't feel anyone is moving out for him."

He shambled off to the little room beyond the kitchen. He didn't know. He couldn't know. He looked around it. Flowers here too. And shining clean. And his suitcases on the floor. But he would know, before this day was over, whether or not he had a wife.

He picked up the bags and carried them back. She was looking out the window. "Hide them behind the door or something," she said impatiently. "There. Now, we just wait." He stood, still staring at her. "Oh, sit down," she said.

"This transformation is too much for me. The great day at last, is it?"

"An hideous day! Darned near the great moment." She sagged a little, resting her temple on the glass.

"The great moment is when Jan gets here," he said heavily.

"I hope she doesn't break her neck getting here, that's all. Pete, do you miss a piano?"

"What?" He was startled. He looked stupidly around the room, which, large as it was, seemed already rather crowded. "Yeah," he admitted. "Sure."

"I thought you did."

"Why?"

"I don't know. I just thought of it."

"The trouble is," he said carefully, "a piano's an awful permanent piece of furniture."

"Oh. I know," said Willie cheerfully. "Now, you take a harp ——"

He went over and sat down on the window seat beside her and hunted for her eyes. "Never mind harps," he said. "What's on your mind, Willie?"

"Same thing that's on yours, I imagine," she said serenely. "I think I'll keep the blank orange until tomorrow."

He thought, It's a showdown after [illegible] said gently, "Darling, there's som[illegible] maybe you don't quite understand. [illegible] is a cheap many affair—what is it, [illegible] right?" She nodded. "Well, you see, [illegible] how I'd rather think about music or it [illegible] music or ——"

"Just . . . s hum?" she murmured.

His heart sank. "Yes, it's just dream[illegible] it . . . rather than try to get it out [illegible] inferior instrument." He wished he [illegible] said it. "I hope you understand ——

Willie answered gravely. "Oh, I do, Pete. And I'm terribly sorry. I shouldn't have been so impulsive."

"No, no," he cried. "It was a damned nice impulse." He pressed for enthusiasm. "After all, you were thinking of me."

"But I wasn't thinking of you quite enough," she said just a trifle bitterly.

"Don't say ——. Say, maybe it's a rare old instrument. It's all we know." He was desperately jovial.

"Well—er—no, it isn't, Pete."

"What is it?" he said gloomily.

"I never heard of it," she answered in the same glum tone.

He wanted to laugh. Maybe it was hysteria. Because he felt panic too. "I'm too funny," he cried. "What difference does it make? You're right about it, Willie."

"No. You're right." He looked at her. She wore a saintly sweetness on that thin clever face. "At least," she added, "you're right too." She held the sainthood another second. Then he saw the little crinkles deepening around her eyes, the writhe of her mouth, the softening of her thin cheek. "Is this conversation human?" inquired Willie, with droll curiosity.

He cried. "Two was the most inhuman, unnatural remark I ever heard in my life!"

"Nuts!" said Willie. She flew up off the bench and swung off down the rug, with her skirt flowing behind her as if she'd forgotten it. "I might have known!" And she was green-eyed, and full of mischief, and her hands were flying. "You're the type to look a gift piano in the strings. All right, maybe I'm dumb to think any old piano in the parlor is worth a couple of new ones in the bush. But I meant well. And furthermore ——"

"Sure," he said, grinning broadly, his heart settling with a tremendous relief, "in your slapdash way, that is so darned irritating, you were being very sweet."

"And a little bit kittenish, too," said Willie with a glint in her eye. "Pretty coy. But that crack of yours ——"

"All right. You can run the house and the finances and the farm and the whole works, but don't pick out my pianos."

"Just for that," she flipped at him, "I'll raise chickens. I'll get you a piano with gold in its teeth and a pedigree a mile long."

"THERE'S my old piano," he said sheepishly. She stopped in her tracks. "It's just sitting in storage."

"Why, the crust!" she cried. "You mean to sit there and tell me we've got a piano! Why didn't you say so?"

"I didn't know you wanted me around, let alone my piano."

"You did, too, know it!" she stormed. "What do you think I've been buttering you up for? For fun?"

He didn't laugh. He said tensely, "For what, then? For why?"

But a horn honked outside. The question died off his face. They went toward the door. His arm went uncertainly over her shoulders. There was just time for the briefest, most tentative caress. She slid away.

"He's walking!" cried Willie. "Oh, Cy!" She ran out into the spring air where sun made a shadow pattern of the pin oak's limbs. She didn't kiss the tall boy with the cane. She took his left hand in her two.

Cy said, in a tight voice, "Is this the right place?"

"You're darned tooting it is!" she cried.

Willie put herself at his other side and [illegible] walked, all three, toward the house. "Y[illegible] mother and Jan will be here just as fast [illegible] they can," Willie told him.

"I expected to go to work today," P[illegible] said. "But it course we had no way of kn[illegible] long before you'd get in."

"Seems like ma," said Cy, stumblin[illegible] hot. Neither of them reached to help h[illegible] He caught the lower half of the door. P[illegible] pulled it open.

"You've all been living here," Cy said [illegible] a tone of wonder, as if although he'd be[illegible] told, he hadn't been able to imagine [illegible] "That's my father's chair," he said, as [illegible] they might not know.

"You see," said Pete impulsively, "[illegible] pretty functional now."

Cy made a small embarrassed gesture wi[illegible] one hand. "You've been swell to ma. I a[illegible] preciate it. And after the way I shot [illegible] mouth off ——" His face was flushed.

"Oh, nonsense," said Willie. "Surely J[illegible] told you! Your mother supported half of m[illegible] all winter, with cold, earned cash."

"Your mother's a great woman, a fi[illegible] woman," said Pete. "She's wonderful to us

Cy leaned back as if he were suddenly e[illegible] hausted. His lids closed. Pete watched hi[illegible] anxiously.

"How about a drink? Better ——" I[illegible] looked at Willie.

Her green eyes turned. They were anxio[illegible] too. "Or a cup of coffee. Tired, Cy?"

"I'm all right." A smile curved on Cy[illegible] blind face. "I was just feeling the feel of t[illegible] cushions. I smell food too." His eyes opene[illegible] go. She stood looking down at him. "Cy, please, could I see your new feet?"

He looked up into her face, in fright. Pete, watching, caught his breath.

"Just a glimpse of the ankles, h'm?" coaxed Willie. "They must be wonderful!"

The boy's eyes kept on hers. "Yeah," he said woodenly, "they're pretty good for being store-bought."

"You're not going to be coy," she said, not flippantly at all.

A look of blank patience, something, fell on Cy's face. "Kind of interesting, the way they did it," he said. "They tailored them right on."

"For goodness' sakes." She crouched down at his feet.

Cy's hand—how white it looked!—yanked at his trouser leg. "Right here," he said. "Fellows say the old kind used to hurt you, but these don't. I can get around pretty easy." He hesitated. He let out a notch of confidence. "One fellow in the ward could even jitterbug," he added.

"I don't believe it!" said Willie.

"I saw him."

"Holy cats!" she said solemnly. She was utterly sincere. Whatever holy cats could mean, at this point, Willie meant it. And the boy could tell. Pete found that suddenly the whole scene tickled him. Willie crouched there in her blue dress, looking so seriously up into the serious young face.

He laughed. He didn't quite know how. And he went to lift up Willie. "Come on, feed him, why don't you? You can admire his legs some other time."

"O.K.," said Willie. "I'm going to haul out a cup of coffee and a piece of chocolate cake, and if it spoils your supper, that's fine."

"I don't guess," said Cy, and now he was grinning, "it will spoil anything." Willie went flying off. "Gee, she's—gee ——"

"She's something, Willie is," said Pete, and knew he was beaming. "You should find out what goes on around here!" He felt as if he were bubbling with gossip, with delightful titbits. He checked himself. "But we want to hear about you."

Cy was looking across the room. "That's ma's old stove, isn't it?"

"Yes. Yes, I guess it is. Some of this stuff came from our apartment in New York. It's kind of a mixture."

"I guess," said Cy, "you didn't get a divorce."

"We couldn't afford it," Pete told him. "Now it looks as if we won't—er—bother." He felt the word was apt.

"That's swell," said Cy and shifted in the chair.

"Listen, son," said Pete desperately, "I made a mistake, way back. I think maybe I ought to tell you. You see, I wanted to be a musician, but I fell in love and I got the girl. And right away, I went out after money and stuff, for Willie, because I was crazy about her and I thought she'd like—well, presents, you know? I thought she'd be pleased to sit on a cushion and let me bring her things. Well, naturally, she thought I valued the money and stuff or the process of getting it. So we got off wrong. It comes over me now—maybe that wasn't what she wanted. I mean to say," Pete fumbled, "don't worry if you can't give Jan the embroidery. Maybe she'd rather have the works." The boy didn't respond. Pete thought, I'm talking about myself. He said, "What are you thinking?" as gently as he could.

"I was thinking," Cy said, flushing, "the light's nice, in here. I'm in a kind of daze, sir. Wasn't listening. I'm sorry."

"You've got a right to be in a daze if you want, son," Pete said. He felt the evasion, the uncertainty, with a heavy heart. "I think . . . there's the family wagon."

"It's . . . them?"

Pete recognized panic. He was sorry. There seemed nothing he could do.

As Jan yanked on the brake and the station wagon lurched to a stop, she said, "Just let me see him? I figured this out, Ada. You've got a priority." Jan opened the door on her side and fell out. She stumbled across the terrace.

Cy was rigid in the Morris chair. His face was as white as hers. She flew to him, slipped her arm across his taut shoulders, and put her cheek on his for an instant. "It's all right," she murmured, "as long as you got here." She straightened up, looking blindly at her father. Ada was moving more sedately through the door. "Come on, dad." Jan seized Pete's hand and drew him away with the rush of her resolve. They were out-of-doors. Around the corner of the house wall, she leaned against the wood. "He . . . looks . . . fine," she said. Cheek on her hand, she gazed across Willie's field. Pete watched with dumb misery. Nothing he could do or say. But slowly the glow came back into her face, the color and the shine.

"You all right, son?" said Ada.

"I guess so, ma."

"She's wrought up, some. Give her a minute."

Cy wrenched his eyes from the empty doorframe. "Ma, how are you?"

"Fine. I'm fine." She sat down near him. She put her hand on his arm, just above the wrist. "Wasn't so funny, I guess," she said, patting him, as once she had when he'd been a baby, "getting out of there. They hurt you, bad?"

"Pretty bad, for a while," he said. His head bent toward her, a little ducking motion. It was a memory too. "Sorry pa had to go while I was away," he said stiffly.

"Well, you was in his mind." Her hand retreated. There was too much emotion.

"Left you alone, though," he murmured. "But the Petersons been swell, h'm?"

Insomnia never comes to a man who has to get up at six o'clock.
—ELBERT HUBBARD.

Ada drew in a grand sniff. "I got nothing against the Petersons," she declared, "any of them." It was high praise and he nodded. "Can you walk, son?" she asked him then.

"Sure. I walked right in here."

Her head began to nod. "I believe you. Well, you're out of that now."

"Ayah."

A little silence spun between them, full of their mutual thoughts.

"You like having a real job, ma?"

"It ain't bad," she said. Then her blue gaze came around. "But I'll do for you, Cy, like I always did, time'll come you'll be working." His body twitched. "Expect you'll have to call off getting married," she went on. He didn't answer. But he was not shocked. This was what he had been waiting for. "Wouldn't be fair," she said. "War's over so long, it ain't the same as it was."

"I guess not," he said thinly. She seemed very strong and calm, sitting there. His muscles let go a little.

"She'd like to have a fit, though," sighed Ada.

"But I got to do what's right."

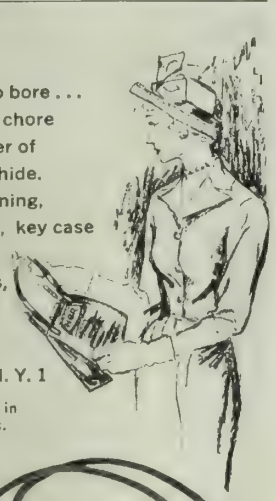
"Ayah," she said placidly. "Girl's got a right to a whole man."

Something in the boy settled clear.

"Ain't going to be so easy, son."

"Not if she don't . . . agree."

"You and me best be by ourselves," she began briskly. "I've looked around some."



Cy pulled himself together. "Anyhow," he said, "what's left of me is mighty glad to be back, ma. Everything's so new-looking, as if I never saw it before. . . . She's so pretty."

"Ayah, pretty and sweet, too, that girl," said Ada vigorously. "And good reason why we'd best go, be by ourselves."

"I guess," he said.

"She hasn't thought more'n you coming home alive. Nobody's had the heart —— She's built a lot on you, Cy. She don't hardly know where she's at. You're going to have to ——"

His lips pressed on the pain. She put it clearly. She made it plain. "Right away," he promised.

"Your ma'd be proud of you," said Ada. "Now, next call her." Ada rose.

Help me up," he said dismally.

Gently, with all her strength, she helped him up. He stood as straight as he could manage with the cane and all. Ada went out the door. And then came Jan.

She came right over to him and put herself into his arms. There was no way out to hold her. He forgot about his cane.

"We didn't think of this, did we?" He was looking over her head. How you talk with pain. "Not being able to get married after all."

She surged away to look up. He almost lost his balance.

"Just listen, quiet, Jan," he heard. "I have to make it plain, right away. You should have a whole man. We got to think for ahead."

"I never heard anything so rude——" Her voice went sparkling up and down.

"No, no," he said.

"Don't you . . . love me?" she whimpered.

"But I . . . don't count."

Willie was standing in the kitchen door with a tray in her hands. Neither of them saw her there.

"What have I been waiting for?" said Jan in a low voice. "What have I been living for? What have I been doing all this while? Don't you believe that I don't care?"

"You don't know, Jan. That's the thing. You don't know how you'll feel about it." She didn't answer. "And it's up to me . . . to look out for you, that's all." Then she wailed a high, hurt cry from the heart.

Jan whirled around. She saw Pete looking in, called by her cry. She saw Willie standing by the table. She saw Ada behind her father. She cried to all them: "He's going to take the hard way. No, Cy—no!"

Cy fell into the chair. "Time will go on," he muttered. "Ma and I will go away. It's better, Jan. Because later on—I nearly can't stand this you know that! But I couldn't stand it at all, when you'd begin to realize—when you'd blame me later on——"

Nobody moved. But Jan seemed to draw on some store of strength that was surely her own. "I guess you haven't thought it out, Cy," she said quietly. "I'm sorry you've lost your feet. It's awful that had to happen to us. But it happened to us. That's what you'll see when you think it out a little more. I'll wait until you do. I can wait a little longer." A strange peace was on her face, a radiant peace, a peace to break your heart. "Willie," she said "shall I help with supper?"

"If you please, my darling," said Willie clearly and sweetly. Willie came down alongside the dining table moving like a cat.

Jan was gone. Jan was in the kitchen. "Willie," warned Pete, "don't——" But he couldn't stop her, and all of a sudden he didn't want to.

She came down the room, aimed at the boy who was lying so senseless in the chair. There was nothing gentle about her, nothing soft, nothing pitying.

"You cheap little half-baked hero!" said Willie. "What a crust you've got! Insulting the men who got their wounds in battle! Was it a fad then? Wasn't there anything real in any girl's devotion? Or, I suppose," she sneered, "you'd like Jan to give you a twenty-year guaranty!"

The boy cringed. Pete thought, This will never—— But he stood back. He held Ada back.

"You," mocked Willie, "and your later on. May I ask what you are going to be doing between now and later on? Sitting around? Waiting for the worst? Putting it up to her to carry the cross? You forget, I think. Who preached a fine sermon, right here in this room? Who ranted and raved about faith and good works? You did, Cyrus Hall, and look at you now! Where's your faith, my fine fair-weather friend? Where's your believing effort? Haven't you got the nerve to take it that she loves you the way you'd dream about if you had the guts to dream so high?"

"I know that!" he flared, as if she'd whipped him and he screamed.

"But you'll throw it out, eh? And you think you ought. Because [illegible] your mother's disciplines and [illegible] suffering for the sake of suffering. I've got it. You've got to be better [illegible] you there's a harder way. And [illegible] a way that's got a little sense in it——"

"I don't understand you," [illegible] Cy said. He was sitting straighter. He was getting mad.

"You don't?" said Willie. "[illegible] where she is, and propose to [illegible] she says 'yes,' have the grace [illegible] she means it. Grace. You'll [illegible] you're going to have to mean [illegible] It can be something exquisite [illegible] It's there, in your hand!"

"But listen——" Cy said.

"If you've got the nerve to [illegible] make such a thing."

"Listen"—Cy broke open—"[illegible] me in the snow and she was with [illegible] I was and she always will be. [illegible] ever blame me—it it should [illegible] looks—— I'm scared, Mrs. Peterson. [illegible] you know it? I'm scared!"

"And you've got a right to be scared," said Willie boldly. "You'd be [illegible]. Of course she's right off the earth, and [illegible] been a way down, and you know [illegible] got no feet, and no money and [illegible] on with, but the two of you [illegible] right. What is that? What [illegible] What are you going to do about it?"

Cy held out a trembling hand. [illegible] voice, vibrant and exciting [illegible]

"If you could go ahead, Cy [illegible] and keep it lousy, and besides—a [illegible] music—go to work and build [illegible] ground. It's dangerous. God [illegible] risk is terrible. Sure, it can die! [illegible] not—if you nourish it. Maybe [illegible] throw your human effort in on [illegible] Remember?"

"Ayah." The word trembled out. [illegible] Willie looked up, blinked, and [illegible]

"Listen," the boy cried to Pete, "[illegible] tell me. You're a man!"

"You want me to tell you?" [illegible] "All right." He swallowed the [illegible] that tended to roll out from his [illegible] get up on your hind legs," he barked, [illegible] go apologize!"

"Yes, sir." Cy rose from his chair [illegible] ing with the cane, he made it about [illegible] help me," he said. "I think I . . . [illegible] can take it."

He walked, then, down the room [illegible] side the long center table. Nobody [illegible] him. He walked all the way to the [illegible] door. He pushed it open. He walked [illegible]

Willie took a step back. She wilted [illegible] knot on the sofa. She hid her face.

Ada made a croaking sound. "Sh[illegible] Pete barked at her. "It never happened, just got home and we're glad."

"Pete," said Willie, clearly and [illegible] coolly, without raising her head, [illegible] around?"

He reached for his pipe. Everything perfectly clear and perfectly fine. "[illegible] me?" he said casually. "Don't worry." sat down beside her and tossed his handkerchief into her lap.

Willie took it and covered her eyes. "[illegible] darn," she mourned, "there's a pumpkin in the oven and I turned it on!"

Ada came around and sat down [illegible] from them. She picked up her sewing, squinted at the needle. "Aw, let it burn, Willie," she croaked.

"Be a sinful waste," snapped Willie.

Pete put his head back and laughed to the rafters. "Sure, let it burn," he gasped. "I'm not much of a pumpkin eater," began [illegible] and then he closed his mouth.

Willie squirmed a little. Her dark head turned toward him, leaned against his arm. He could see the lashes half down over her wet green eyes. Their thoughts wheeled and knew, together: "——had a wife who couldn't keep her. Put her in a pumpkin shell——"

He put his chin down on the top of her head.

He didn't answer but slowly toyed with his glass, and I turned from him to watch the cold young men smile coldly at the warm young girls. Then I heard his voice coming at me from the side and I turned to face him. He said, as if there had been no pause between sentences:

"We had just taken that town and the other outfit with us was moving up so we decided to rest in the town. We got four houses to bunk in, after chasing out the German families."

He turned his glass around on the wet bar and let out a great, deep sigh as if at that moment the sigh was the biggest and most important thing to do. His mouth was close to my ear and it wasn't noisy at the bar because it was the kind of café where soft light and low voices were in order, and so there wasn't any point in his being so close but he was and I nodded my head to him, and he said:

"After we got organized into sections we took over our rooms. We claimed places to sleep and then one of the guys wanted to know where the john was and so I went with him in search of it."

He tapped with his fingers on the bar and then quickly threw the remainder of his drink down his throat and called out, "Bartender!"

The bartender looked at him and raised his brows.

He pushed our glasses forward. "Hit it, twice," he said.

Then the shining drinks were before us and he looked into the glazed surface of his and then looked up at me and continued:

"So we came to the john and the door was closed. I said to my buddy, 'You go first.' But he refused and I put my hand on the doorknob and one hand flat on his back and said, 'Go ahead.'

"I whipped the door open and pushed him in and there was a terrific explosion which flung me back as if a great wind had hit me. I went smashing back against the wall. I lay dazed on the floor with the door partly covering me and the debris around my body, and hearing voices and footsteps rushing up the stairs." He shook his head violently. "Some Germans had booby-trapped the toilet door. I had opened it and pushed him in."

And I said, "Oh." It wasn't very much to say, but I think he understood.

He wet his lips. "I was bruised a little but he was deader than a mackerel."

That's all it was and I said, "You didn't know that it would happen that way."

He nodded. "That part I understand, but it's that I can't forget. After that I was afraid to open doors. It got very bad for me in the outfit and they sent me back to a hospital and then it got even worse for me and they sent me home. Now I'm like this." He stared at me, holding his drink in his hand.

"What will you do about it?" I asked.

"What can I do?"

I didn't answer.

"You see," he said, a little triumphantly, "there's nothing I can do. I'm just afraid to open doors. I want to open them but I can't."

Then I remembered the guy who had wanted an operation on his nose. I said, "In the hospital I was in overseas was a guy who needed an operation on his nose. He always told the doc that there was a terrible stink in his nostrils and would they please operate on him to take the odor away."

His eyes grew bright with a kind of interest and he moved nervously about his stool. "What happened to him?" he asked.

I said, "They put him in the neuropsychiatric ward for observation but he insisted that he needed an operation, so they gave him a nose wash but he said that what he needed was an operation, so they sent him back to the outfit he had come from."

He looked at me. "Did they cure him?"

I shrugged. "That's all I know. Later I went away."

"What good was it telling me?" he asked.

"Just thought you'd like to hear a story. I remembered it all of a sudden."

He nodded his head and said, "That's bad, having a smell in your nose that you can't take out." His eyes met mine. "That's bad, isn't it?" he asked.

"I guess so," I said.

So we sat there for a while talking of things which we should have known were best not to be talked of but which talk we were helpless to prevent. Then after that we lapsed into silence, hiding within our own inviolate thoughts.

Then he asked me suddenly, "Do you smell anything?"

I sniffed at the air about us and I said, "No."

"Like fire?" he asked.

Then I smelled the smoke and I said, "Yes, I do."

So we breathed in the smell and then looked back to where the curtain was which concealed the dance floor, and above the curtain a long column of thick smoke was coming forth and my friend said, "Bartender, don't you smell smoke?"

But the bartender didn't have much to say then because the dance-floor patrons were coming out in groups and quickly moving to the narrow entrance. Their voices filled the big room. Then there was a muffled explosion as if an oven exploded and there were screams of women. The people pushed madly at one another and shouted, "Fire!"

And I turned to my friend, but he wasn't with me. I looked around for him. His cigarettes and change remained by his drink but he was gone, and over the screams of the mob I heard his voice entreating, "Open the door, open the door."

I SAW him at the front of the frightened men and women and I realized that he must have leaped from his stool and was then suddenly confronted by the door and behind him the men and women pushing and crowding him. The door space was so narrow that he took up all its room.

And the people yelled at him, "Open that door!"

But I knew what was wrong with him and they didn't and so I pushed and beat my way toward him. When I was close I saw him with his shoulders and head bowed, his hands up to his face, shaking himself back and forth. I felt his horrible struggle with himself going through me, and I shouted, "Open that door. Open it!"

He must have heard me because his head snapped up. I saw him look around and his eyes grabbed my gaze and he looked yet beyond at the sea of mute faces staring at him with fear-filled expressions, beseeching him mutely, and I saw the gigantic pleading of his eyes for understanding from them; but he was up there in front, and he knew that he was and that he held their lives in the palm of his hand.

And then, perhaps because of the time past in the Army where he had been trained to assume great and sudden responsibilities, or whatever it was, anyway, he let forth a terrible, agonizing shriek, almost of defiance, and yelled, "Cover up, cover up," stilling the room to absolute silence, and he flung the door open. A convulsive heave of the crowd swept him out into the street and the crowd went forward and I with them on the wave.

I went out into the rain and I sought for him and I found him in a darkened doorway trembling, breathing heavily, and I stood with him.

He said, "I opened the door."

"Yes, you did. You opened the door," I answered.

Then, I think, I'm not sure, it might have been the rain on his face, but I think it was something else, anyway, he said, "I'll go home now."

We went out into the rain and I walked beside him. He stood for a moment in front of his house and then he reached down and took my hand, clasped it once tightly and then walked up the steps and opened his door.

I stood in the rain and stared at the door through which he had gone and then I walked home.

Sending Three Girls to College

BY JAN WEYL

WHEN Ray Melson was growing up in Alberta, Canada, going to school meant a three-mile ride every morning over a rough, hilly, dirt road aboard a mouse-colored pony named Dandy. Ray was a small, brown-haired boy whose size belied his strength. He had good strong muscles from hours of pitching hay, milking cows and shocking grain—and he had energy and determination. Weather permitting, he and Dandy made the trip in forty-five minutes. This small country school opened new worlds to Ray, and as he grew older he talked more and more to his dad about moving somewhere near a high school—and then a college.

Ray's wish came true—the result of his own hard work and his parents' understanding. Today he is touching fifty, a slight, baldheaded college graduate who looks like President Truman with his hat on, like what he really is with it off—an energetic, slightly harried family man who has definite goals for his family, and not enough money to make them come true without more of the same hard work that has been following him all his life. He works.

J. DUPLESS

MARILYN . . .

Pretty, 20, is a junior at Oregon State College, majoring in home economics. The family party girl, she averages three dates weekly, pays all college fees with only $85 a month.

ANNIE . . .

Intense at 21, devoted to music and recently married to pianist William Kapell, hopes for same career herself "if there's time with a traveling, talented husband around."

POSIE . . .

Eager, spirited, 19, will study the piano in Chicago this year on $1000 gift from piano teacher back home, hopes to keep her expenses to $85 monthly "if I don't eat too much."

How much do parents owe their chil

Relaxation: five minutes in the morning, maybe an hour at night. But a "busy life is the best," says Nellie, who went back to schoolteaching in 1943 and contributes her entire income to help pay her daughters' college expenses.

His wife works. And his three daughters work. All because the three girls have been going to college at the same time.

College, to Ray and Nellie, his lively, black-haired wife, is the means to an end—and that end is happiness. "We want each of the girls to be better equipped for life than the average, and to be in a position to take advantage of her capabilities," says Ray seriously. "The way we see it, college is the answer. Our job now is to provide money, and advice when it's needed." The quest for knowledge still excites Ray. He remembers his own college days, the classes he took, the new horizons which his studies unveiled. He reads newspapers avidly, buys magazines for articles on sociology and politics. Education, for him, is a working, living thing. And this opportunity to learn is what he is giving his daughters.

With Annie, their vivacious, red-haired oldest daughter, what to do has never been a problem. Ever since she began playing "lalas" on her grandmother's piano, Annie's life has been moving toward a career as a concert pianist. Recently married to William Kapell, outstanding young concert pianist, Annie is traveling in South America and this country with Willie, hopes to return to her own studies soon. Willie, whose own career is well established, is eager to help Annie with hers. Now twenty-one, Annie has had four years of college, and lived last year in a small, inexpensive studio apartment in Chicago where she studied music at De Paul University, practiced five hours a day, and restricted herself to one date a week. Annie is talented. According to her former teachers, she has "the ability to be a concert pianist—someday." She is young and intense—and if hard work and devotion are the marks of success, she should have it.

With Marilyn, who's twenty and a Home Economics major at Oregon State College, the way has been equally clear—and quite different. Marilyn, who has brown hair, clear blue eyes and a pretty, young face, says frankly, "My talents are sewing and cooking—and the future I hope for is marriage." At school she is active in her sorority, dates more than either of her sisters. When she's home, she does most of the housework, spends her spare time sewing and knitting, and carrying on lengthy telephone conversations. The biggest problem in her life now is the hazard involved in dating three boys from the same fraternity house.

"My lazy days are far behind me." Nellie is teacher to forty lively third-graders in portable clapboard schoolroom where she stokes the wood furnace herself, studies nights and summers working for her own college degree.

"Our postcollege dream—a house in the country with an office for Ray, a workroom for Nellie." The Nelsons pay $503.58 yearly on house mortgage, bought furniture on the installment plan, painted the walls by themselves.

Ray and Nellie take each girl's future seriously, and, when nineteen-year-old Posie (Joyce) was trying to decide last spring whether to spend a second year at Portland's Reed College or to follow Annie's footsteps to De Paul and more music training, there were many family confabs before they decided in favor of De Paul. Posie is the fun lover of the three girls. She has a wide, attractive face with big blue eyes, wears her reddish-blond hair in a feather cut. She's more intelligent than her sisters, according to I. Q.'s, but she hasn't applied herself to anything yet. Posie, like Annie, plays the piano. Her teachers agree that she has more natural talent than Annie, but less application. She is too young yet to know what she definitely wants to do, but pretty sure, just the same, that she wants to marry and use her music "to make money, if I have to."

The Melsons live in a small, story-and-a-half white frame house on the east side of Portland, Oregon. The house sits on an equally small piece of land—too small for Nellie to have the kind of garden she's always wanted. The house is sparsely furnished. Only one room has a rug. There is a minimum of bric-a-brac. In the cellar Ray's desk and Nellie's washing machine are so close together that when clothes are hung up to dry, they drip on Ray's papers. In cold weather, if the whole family's home, Ray sleeps in his overcoat because there aren't enough blankets to keep everyone warm. Ray is on the road thirty out of fifty-two weeks selling aluminum cooking utensils. Nellie, since 1943, has been teaching grade school from eight to four, and spending three evenings a week at night school working for her college degree. Nellie is no

"It's father who pays." Ray has no budget, would like to plan ahead but gets "no co-operation," worries because his savings account has never registered more than $120. His income—almost $5000—is highest he has ever made.

The car works overtime too. Ray is on the road thirty weeks a year selling aluminumware, lends car to girls on week ends for dates, near-by concerts. His six-cents-a-mile allotment from company covers most of gas and upkeep.

Ray sells the way he lives—being scrupulously fair to the other person. Many customers like this one let him write out order. Working half a territory more than usual brings "more money, less time to spend with Nellie and the girls."

Marilyn refuses date—"because he didn't call enough in advance." Posie, who spends more time practicing, wants to marry someone "who will make a supreme effort to understand me and beat me up whenever I need it."

"When your children know what t

longer soprano soloist in the church choir. Ray has given up his Sunday-school class. There is little time for recreation, little time even to be together. These are things the Melsons don't have—they are sacrifices for college.

What they do have is of considerably more value to them. Between Ray and Nellie, and their daughters, there are tremendous love and respect. They like one another, and they like to be together. That's why, when the girls are home, they often invite friends over for breakfast before church, or dinner before a date. The family always spends its vacation on Nellie's father's big truck farm at Bellingham, Washington; they take summer Sunday jaunts to near-by beaches, loading Ray's car with parents, daughters, boy friends, picnic baskets. When the girls were in high school Ray went to football and basketball games "to see how the boy friends were doing." The boys who come into the house—and there are plenty—treat Ray and Nellie with breezy informality tempered with respect. Bill Rowley, who's dated all the girls and is now regarded as a family friend, thinks nothing of asking, "What's good in the refrigerator, Mrs. Melson?"

The secret of keeping close to your children, as Ray and Nellie see it, is to "always treat them as intelligent human beings, not as babies, Posie, the family hairdresser, gives Marilyn home permanent before big prom. Girls, who started dating at fourteen, trade secrets, never trade boy friends if "hands off" policy is declared. "We rarely like the same type anyway."

Posie needs new wardrobe for Chicago. Just learning to sew, she has good teachers. Nellie won second prize in a national contest with a wedding dress. Marilyn has high average in college clothing classes, made her own wardrobe.

ut, you owe them the chance."

and to discuss things with them on their own terms." They have an honest desire to know how the girls feel about things. When Annie and Posie first took up the piano seriously, Ray, who has had virtually no musical background, took lessons himself. But when he couldn't get any farther than My Bonnie Lies Over the Ocean because his fingers "kept getting all tangled up," he had to give up. Last year he and Nellie took a music-appreciation course. They have both read books on music and listen to symphonies on the radio.

The Melson girls value their father's careful, thoughtful reasoning and their mother's ability to look at things their way. When they started dating, Nellie taught them how to feel socially secure by helping them see boys as "people, not strange, unexplainable characters." She told them about boys' problems and dissatisfactions, feeling that would help them with their own. She helped them find the best make-up, clothes and hair styles, encouraged them to bring their friends home after school. She discussed emotional reactions and sex, and told the girls, "If there's anything you want to know, I'll be glad to tell you." And she always has. If she doesn't know the answer, she and her daughter "research it" in a psychology book. The girls appreciate the fact that Nellie is willing to say, "I don't know the answer—but I do know where we can find it." Nellie is always ready to help, but says realistically, "You can't force these talks. You have to wait for the girls to bring them up."

The girls are little more than a year apart in age, yet they get along remarkably well. There have been problems. Marilyn, whose interests are poles away from her sisters', used to feel excluded when Posie and Annie talked of music and books. Her own experience with music—

Folk dancing is Posie's favorite exercise, especially with Walter (above), "who will be quite somebody someday." Marilyn goes to more proms at coed school, Annie and Willie prefer small intellectual discussions with friends.

Teacher-composer Serge Tarnowsky says Annie has "the ability to be a concert pianist—someday." As struggling music student, Annie scrimped winters, worked summers, earned full-tuition scholarship at De Paul University.

Posie, a freshman at Portland's Reed College last year, lived home, paid $500 tuition, managed expenses on $20 a month. Teaching piano to neighbor (above) is one of many jobs which girls have held to earn extra cash.

Oregon State has two men to every girl. On rear of motor bike, Marilyn sits on pillow, clutches date as bike hits 30 mph. Below, Posie and date.

Girls learned healthy dating attitudes from mother's good advice.

BUFFORD

Two careers in one family? "Willie's will always come before mine."

first the piano, then singing, finally the saxophone—had been a dismal failure because she simply wasn't interested. On the night Annie gave a piano recital before 250 people just before her high-school graduation, Marilyn was in tears for the last time, wailed, "I'll never be able to do anything that anyone will want to come and see!" Now she feels more mature about these differences, has her own socially active life, and says matter-of-factly, "They have their line, and I have mine, and each one counts." Marilyn's life is following the pattern she has chosen; she is dated ahead for weeks, and getting better-than-average marks.

Until Annie's marriage, she and Posie shared a bedroom at home. Marilyn has her own bedroom next door, while Ray and Nellie sleep downstairs. Annie and Marilyn gang up together on Posie, and as is usually typical with the younger member of any family, worry about her clothes and table manners. Posie passes this off with nonchalance, keeps on doing things her way. She does listen to Annie seriously, however, about music.

Where men are concerned, the girls have definite rules. If one girl is interested in a man, she announces same, and her sisters obey a "hands off" policy. This has worked beautifully—the boys have always understood it, and no two girls have been interested in the same man, anyway, at the same time. The family, en masse, always inspects each new boy friend—"horrible for him, fun for us." Annie remembers waiting nervously for her first date to arrive. Finally the doorbell rang. Annie rushed to the door, opened it, and there stood Posie, grinning broadly! They've played similar tricks on Marilyn, but "we've never caught up with Posie."

BREAKING APRON STRINGS—AND HEART STRINGS

By Gladys Denny Shultz

JUST when do our children become grownups? At what age should we take hands off our offsprings' affairs, leave them to make their decisions unassisted and to live their lives in the way good to them, without parental admonition or interference?

Every intelligent parent realizes that this time must come. Yet how many know when the psychological moment has arrived? And what is our duty when we see our grown, or nearly grown, children making decisions and following a life pattern which seems wrong to us?

Ray and Nellie Melson have done a superlative job of preparing their daughters for responsible, successful and happy adulthood.

Ray, far more than most fathers, has given earnest attention to home problems. Ray and Nellie together have grounded their children in religion, morals and ethics. Early they gave each girl special training. They saw to it that each girl carried a full share of responsibility in the home, and also worked at a variety of jobs throughout high school, turning in her earnings to the family purse.

It was no surprise, therefore, to find the three Melson girls have never given any concern about their personal conduct; to find them hard-working and responsible, with feet firmly on the road to economic independence.

But it was a surprise and a challenge to find the Melsons at a storm-filled period in the important rite of breaking the apron strings, with rebellion, albeit of a most loving variety, rife among the daughters, and Ray and Nellie—particularly Ray—at wit's end.

Posie, the youngest, a freshman at Reed College, was warring upon what she considered her parents' intolerant views on religion and social customs. Marilyn, the middle one, a sophomore in home economics at Oregon State College, felt aggrieved because at home she was still ordered about like a little girl and kept so busy with household tasks that she had little time left for the sewing and studying she would like to do.

But it was twenty-one-year-old Anna Lou, the eldest, who had just precipitated the real bombshell. Anna Lou, recognized by her sisters as the beauty; Anna Lou, who had won scholarship after scholarship in music; Anna Lou, who had been so fanatically bent upon a career that her parents had feared she was sacrificing her personal life, that she might never marry.

Now she had just informed them, out of the blue, that she was planning to give up all this and marry William Kapell, at twenty-six already an internationally famous pianist—and a Jew. For the deeply Presbyterian Melsons, this last was quite a thing to swallow. She had called them from New York, where she had gone to be presented to Kapell's people, and told them of her plan to be married soon, so that she might accompany Kapell on his summer South American concert tour.

"I BEG of you, I implore you, don't do anything without consulting us first," her father pleaded. "Let's talk it over when you come home."

"If I come home," was Annie's reply. That had hurt Ray Melson more than anything else.

Here was a romance calculated to warm the heart of any fiction addict—the unknown music student marrying one of the prominent musicians of the day, and thereby sharing his luxury, fame and glamour. Yet as I talked with the Melsons, it was apparent that these considerations meant nothing to them. Their little daughter was proposing to abandon the pattern they had laid down for her and was making alone the most important decision of her life.

Thus was presented an opportunity to get both sides on three problems which come up in many homes in the transition period between childish dependence and full adult status. What obligation, if any, should grown-up children feel for maintaining the parental home? When are children old enough to marry? And what are parents to do when a boy or girl elects a choice of mate and kind of life which do not accord with the family tradition?

Children mature at widely differing ages; some never learn to manage their affairs wisely, some have to fight fiercely to keep from being stifled. But the three Melson girls are self-reliant and mature beyond their years. The only bonds they have to break are of unusual love and devotion to their interests. Can these latter, so worthy in themselves, nevertheless be a handicap to growing up?

THE Melsons offered an ideal clinic. Highly intelligent and articulate, all five faced their various problems from a background of mutual love and respect.

I talked with Marilyn first, alone. Closest of the three to her father, it has never entered her mind to doubt the values by which he lives his life. "We were brought up to believe certain things, and that's the way they are—we never question them."

As the middle child, an always difficult spot, complicated in her case by the fact that she was between two musically gifted sisters, Marilyn has had a special adjustment problem, which her parents have brought her through with signal success. The most popular when it comes to dates and parties, like the others she was freed when she reached college age of the rather close, though loving, supervision maintained by her parents throughout high school.

But at vacation time, her father is always calling Marilyn from things she would like to do, to help her mother with the housework. She recognizes fully that her mother needs the help and acknowledges it is only right and fair that while her parents are making sacrifices for her they should expect her to carry her share when she is at home.

"But I live for the day when I will be through college, and won't feel under obligation to them any more!" said Marilyn.

Ray, at whose leading strings Marilyn's resentment is directed, attributes his middle daughter's attitude to the fact that to give her confidence they permitted her as a child to pick and choose the tasks she would perform. Thus, while Marilyn works hard at things she is interested in, she is inclined to shirk those that do not appeal to her.

Nellie's reaction to her remark was the forthright one which I had come to expect from her.

"I wonder if youngsters ever realize that parents, too, look forward to the time when they won't have to feel obligation and responsibility for their children any more?" she replied instantly.

Marilyn's rebellion was minor. Posie's cut much deeper into the parental heart strings—because her parents taught her that only cked people smoke and drink; that the ristian religion is the only right one, all hers being wrong; because she has followed Annie's footsteps in choosing music for a reer and in going to Reed; because until w her views have been formed, and her cisions made, by her parents or older sis-rs.

"Mother and dad were wonderfully good d reasonable about pointing out why their ay was the right one—but they wouldn't mit there was any other. I never could lk over anything on which I disagreed with em. For a long time after I came to col-ge, I was in a terrible state of confusion. I und that some very nice people smoke, d even drink moderately. In my humani-s course I learned that many religions ve virtues.

"The great trouble is that daddy wants l his daughters to be just as he would be if were a girl. It was daddy who started nnie and me on our musical careers. But began to worry when Annie applied her-lf so intensely, and started slipping away om his ideas about what she should do ith her life. He's objecting to my going to hicago next year to study, for fear I will come like Annie. But I'm not like Annie. addy just can't understand that we have be individuals, and do some things differ-ntly from the way he would do them."

Posie's present boy friend—like Annie's apell, he is Jewish—has been instrumental opening her eyes to the fact that she has t been encouraged to think for herself. e envies him his broader viewpoint.

"I suppose he is really an atheist, but to e he is as much a Christian as my father, not more so. He is kind nd tolerant of other peo-e's ideas, even when he sagrees with them. If at isn't Christianity, hat is?

"As long as I live I shall el guilty if I do some-ing of which I know y parents would disap-rove," Posie ended with a burst of feeling, and that just isn't right!"

In short, Posie is in typical adolescent re-olt, rejecting her parents' guidance and urning to that of others—an important fea-ure, really, of the weaning process. The ony which many worthy parents have ex-erienced is that the very advantages they ave worked and sacrificed to give their hildren have diverted them from concepts hich seem the only right ones to their arents.

It is a high tribute to the love, kindness nd wisdom with which Ray and Nellie have nparted their somewhat strict standards hat Posie's revolt is one of ideas only. She either drinks nor smokes; she has no hought of changing her religion; she wants o study in Chicago next year, even though his means following still further in her eld-st sister's footsteps. She is grateful for her pbringing, in spite of her feeling it made er something of a snob.

But Annie, at that time supposedly hard t work in Chicago, was the crux of the Mel-on story. My curiosity about her had grown s, in my talks with the others, her charac-er and personality had been unfolding.

I had gathered that she was a demon vorker, ambitious, a little self-centered in her drive toward the goal she had set her-elf, but attractive, talented and with an unusual faculty for engaging the interest and help of important people. (It was the wife of the manager of the Boston Symphony who had said to Annie, "You must meet our Willie!" and thus had started the romance now the storm center of the Melson affairs.)

Annie, indeed, was evidently quite a girl. Whether she married William Kapell or not I doubted that she would follow the course mapped out for her by the gentle, unself-seeking Ray Melson.

Ray, in his quiet voice, discussed his fears. Was Annie old enough to marry; did she know William Kapell well enough? Might she not later regret the sacrifice of all she had worked for in her own career?

(Kapell, accustomed to electrifying exacting audiences, and to being sought after, was somewhat taken aback by these objections when Annie tactfully relayed them to him. "After all, it isn't exactly as though I were a ditchdigger!" was his comment.)

Looming large in Ray Melson's mind was the matter of religious difference and of discrimination, to which Annie would be subjecting not only herself but her children.

"I wrote Annie that I didn't know as I very much liked the thought of a grandson of mine running down the street, with a gang of boys after him yelling, 'Sheeny, sheeny!'" was the way Ray expressed this. "And we have to take into consideration that certain of Mrs. Melson's relatives will think we have failed terribly and hold it against us if we permit a daughter of ours to marry outside the Christian religion. If only," he said feelingly, "we could get Annie back home here as part of the family again for three months. I think we could persuade her at least to wait until she is older and has her college degree. And if she wants to bring Kapell along," he added, generosity and fairness asserting themselves, "we would do our best to make friends with him."

Nellie Melson took exception in her forthright, yet kindly, way to her husband. She didn't feel the views of her relatives should be taken into account; she didn't believe that, in the artistic circles in which the young Kapells would move, they would suffer from discrimination.

Mrs. Melson herself had rebelled against the strict traditions of her family. Perhaps that is why she is freer than her husband to decide these things on their merits. Ray Melson suffers when he cannot get his loved ones to see things the family way.

Yet there is no trace of neurotic, selfish possessiveness; his love for this stormy-petrel daughter, his pride in her were evident. He showed me a letter Annie had written, in which she had set forth with passionate, yet loving and considerate, conviction her ideas about religion and human relationships, to prove to me that his eldest had a good head on her shoulders and was using it.

It may be imagined with what eagerness I looked forward to seeing Annie, and getting her story. I was to stop off the plane and breakfast with her in Chicago. But I didn't see Annie in Chicago. Her roommate told me, instead, that Annie had married William Kapell the day before, and had gone to New York, called there by the death of Kapell's teacher, Mme. Olga Samaroff. "Please don't tell anyone," begged the roommate. "Annie's parents don't know, and she wants to be the one to tell them."

I caught up with her in New York a week later. I was presented to a girl like any other college girl—slight, hatless, with true golden hair hanging a bit raggedly about a pale and slightly haggard face.

"I'll look better when I have had some sleep," she said. "You see, I haven't told my parents yet, and all I can think of is how they are going to feel."

Annie plunged into a frank discussion of the problems with her parents, and it was evident that their fears lest she was acting hastily and under emotional stress were unfounded. Annie is mature for twenty-one, with a quick intelligence. She respects her parents' viewpoint and has a sympathetic understanding of the way they have been molded by their own early experiences.

"My father is a rarely wonderful person, one of the two or three finest people I have ever known in my life. I know that everything he has ever done has been dictated by the most unselfish love, and that is why he suffers so much when there is the slightest conflict in the family. That's what has made all this so difficult for me—that I love and respect him so much. When he called me on the phone, I couldn't talk to him, I was weeping so."

A budget, to many a college girl, means a limited amount of money . . . not necessarily a limited number of clothes, particularly when she makes them herself. Marilyn Melson has a talent for being the best-dressed girl in her class and probably spends less money on her clothes than any of her friends. She is so professional with the needle that bound buttonholes are as easy for her as turning a hem. She agrees that it's important that your clothes do not look as though you had made them. Let your friends be green with envy and your beaux beam with pride when you say you did. Keep an extra length of fabric in your favorite color on hand . . . perhaps a lush piece of satin for a dreamy prom dress. A portable sewing machine goes to college as naturally as a typewriter. (Remember this when you're wondering what you want for Christmas!) Have your roommate help in fitting and hanging a skirt, and you can do the same for her. Don't think that sewing is something you have to do if you can't afford to buy your clothes; rather, it is a creative talent. Develop it and your clothes will be as much a part of you as your current hair-do. ★ BY NORA O'LEARY

Here are nine college-girl experts telling Dawn Crowell Norman their individual ideas and formulas on what it takes to make a girl popular on a college campus.

Marilyn Melson, of Oregon State, says, "Join school organizations. You don't have to wait to be asked!"

PASSPORT TO POPULARITY

A prom program penciled solid is a neon-bright addition to your college memory book. So is a straight-A report card, a snapshot of your roommate, or a clipping from the campus paper headlining you as beauty queen. But to shine in only one of these departments is symptomatic of a lopsided personality. You'll find the shortest distance between you and all-round popularity is a straight line of interest in other people. College girls from coast to coast, taking an interest in you, have submitted these questions—as a ruler first, then as a blueprint for improvement. Choose an "A" or "B" answer for each question. Then check page 249 and see how you may rate with your friends. ★ By Dawn Crowell Norman

1. Your roommate's rumba is famous; Betty is the campus Babe Zaharias. If neither the dance floor nor tennis court claims you as queen, do you ——

A. Mutter about "show-offs" and extroverts to compensate for your not being a girl of distinction?

B. Start an honest campaign to cultivate a special talent of your own, even if it's playing jazz on the ocarina?

2. You meet a new freshman, forlornly rinsing out her socks in the washroom. Do you ——

A. Ask if you can give her a hand getting acquainted?

B. Make sure she knows you're an upperclassman by coolly reminding her that her laundry is blocking traffic?

3. College men have a head for figures—especially when it comes to certain girls. If you're not one of them do you ——

A. Excuse your excess weight by describing the hypothyroid condition that runs in your family?

B. Plan a personal success course, including a really daily run and a sweetless, starchless diet?

4. Your date shows up with a movie-followed-by-hamburgers light in his eye. Do you ——

A. Beat him to the punch with your enthusiasm for Ingrid Bergman's latest?

B. Tell him what you want to do before you consider the light, or the state of his pocketbook?

5. Your roommate keeps her bed made and her dresser top shining. Do you ——

A. Dismiss your personal clutter as picturesque and Bohemian?

B. Share toward making your room an attractive home base for both of you?

6. The phone rings at 6 P.M. and you charge down two flights of stairs, because Philip said he'd call at six! But when you're sure it's for someone else, do you ——

A. Go out of your way to answer it anyway, hoping the other girls will do the same for you?

B. Put a record on the phonograph to drown out the noise?

7. Grace's room, three doors down, is the spot on your floor for bull sessions and brownies from home after dating hours. Have you ——

A. Stuck close to your desk, writing home to mother about unfair "cliques"?

B. Asked Grace for a friendly stop-in at your room, taking a few personal notes on her popularity quotient?

8. Patsy's rhinestone choker and Gloria's gloves lift your basic black out of the old look and into the new . . . they're dears to lend them; but when they feel the same about your perfume or charm bracelets, do you ——

A. Reciprocate, but quick!

B. Make excuses for not lending?

9. Last night, with you see-worthy in moonlight and a new formal, Tom asked you to wear his fraternity pin. Did you ——

A. Take it to spark your growing collection?

B. Tactfully pass it up, because Tom means nothing special to you?

CHOCOLATE NUT SUNDAE LAYER CAKE

Preparations. Have the shortening at room temperature. Line bottoms of two deep 9-inch layer pans with paper; grease. Start oven for moderate heat (350°F.). Sift flour once before measuring.

Measure into sifter:

2½ cups sifted Swans Down Cake Flour
3 teaspoons Calumet Baking Powder
1 teaspoon salt
1¼ cups sugar

Measure into mixing bowl:

⅔ cup shortening

Measure into cup:

1 cup milk
1½ teaspoons vanilla

Have ready:

5 egg whites, beaten to meringue* with ½ cup sugar

*For meringue, beat 5 egg whites with rotary egg beater (or at high speed of electric mixer) until foamy; add ½ cup sugar gradually, beating only until meringue will hold up in soft peaks.

Now—The "Mix-Easy" Part! (Mix by hand or at a low speed of electric mixer.) Stir shortening just to soften. Sift in dry ingredients. Add milk and mix until all flour is dampened. Then beat 2 minutes. Add meringue mixture and beat 1 minute longer. (Count only actual beating time. Or count beating strokes. Allow about 150 full strokes per minute. Scrape bowl and spoon often.)

Baking. Turn batter into pans. Bake in moderate oven (350°F.) about 35 minutes. Spread Chocolate Sundae Frosting between layers and on top of cake, reserving ¼ cup frosting for decorating. Sprinkle ½ cup coarsely chopped nut meats over top of cake. Heat the reserved frosting with 2 teaspoons hot water over hot water until thinned, stirring constantly. Dribble from teaspoon over nuts.

Chocolate Sundae Frosting. Melt 4 squares Baker's Unsweetened Chocolate in double boiler. Remove from boiling water, add 2½ cups sifted confectioners' sugar and 4 tablespoons hot water and blend. Add 5 egg yolks, one at a time, beating well after each. Then add 6 tablespoons butter, 1 tablespoon at a time, beating thoroughly after each amount.

Week-end Cook-off

BY LOUELLA G. SHOUER

On Saturday and Sunday morning there's a whir of activity in Melson kitchen. Pots bubble on the range, the old oven works o time and everyone is busy cooking ahead for the week to foll

The Melsons have a busy schedule five days a week. In the past, t depended on quick broiler meals or what could be done in a few minute their pressure saucepan. They had no set plans for meals. First one ho started dinner, and meals were planned haphazardly from day to day. M Melson thought leftovers impractical, wasteful, but only because she h no definite plan for using them. Now she thinks the idea of planning a cooking ahead will work out fine for them, and perhaps it will for you t

Following are six dinners for Sunday through Friday, planned so that much cooking as possible can be done Saturdays and Sundays. A back of planned leftovers is part of the secret of this type of menu planni These are simple, everyday meals—made up of dishes most families l and serve often. You're familiar with their basic preparation, so you wo need recipes. It's the what-to-do and when-to-do-it that will make th menus really save time for you. We'll start with Saturday, as that's t key day for making it easy during the week.

Three pounds of hamburger are better than two when you have to think ahead on meals. Mrs. Melson shapes part into patties for a quick dinner Saturday night. The rest is made into a meat loaf that will come to the table Monday, and reappear Wednesday in casserole dish.

Sliced Tomatoes Applesauce
Coffee—Milk

The applesauce is made. . . . For the pudding: Cut corn off the cob (left over from Sunday). Follow your regular recipe for corn pudding, but add diced baked ham. Bake in individual custard cups, instead of large casserole, to cut down baking time. . . . The sweet potatoes need only slicing and candying in sirup and a little butter or margarine. Remember, you cooked extra sweet potatoes Sunday, when you made the casserole. If you had any of the ham glaze left over Sunday and saved it in a jar, this is fine stuff to candy the sweet potatoes in. . . . Use frozen or canned spinach if you are especially pressed for time.

This is the night odds and ends really have their inning. Dice meat loaf. Combine with any leftover green beans and potatoes au gratin. Reseason. Add 1 onion, chopped, and if you need to stretch the mixture, add 1 small can of peas and a little milk—not enough to make it soupy. Pour into casserole. Top with buttered crumbs and bake until bubbly. This is really good. Sometimes a casserole dish made up of this and that is better than one you'd start from scratch. . . . For the salad, dice leftover tomato aspic. Arrange it on salad greens with slices of ripe avocado and serve with French dressing—a pretty salad and one you might not have thought of if you hadn't had the tomato distinguish between 5000 and 200 people; and I often longed for a good old newspaper with no higher ideal to promote than making money by telling the public the facts. For I am convinced that what every journalist and writer on public affairs should cultivate is a respect for accuracy and disinterestedness.

I do not believe that it is wise for the political writer to commit himself blindly to any party or persons, but to the ideal of truth. And where sufficient numbers of them do the latter, they create a climate and almost always win a following, for there is no more enduring reputation than that for honesty and disinterestedness.

Readers can do much, also, to help a free press become more free and more courageous.

They can help by being tolerant of opinion. Opinions are sustained or corrected by events. They cannot be infallible. But he with whom I differ today may prove to have been right tomorrow.

Readers should be intolerant of inaccurate facts. If the reader knows better, he should write to the editor or the writer. All writers occasionally make errors of fact and should be grateful to have them corrected. (This gives me a chance to correct an error of fact in a recent LADIES' HOME JOURNAL article when I quoted as from the Protestant Episcopal marriage ceremony the passage "with my body I thee worship," which is not in that service but in the ceremony of the Church of England. The book containing the service was not in my library; I have, usually, a good memory, but I should have checked it and looked it up! A number of clergymen promptly pointed out the error.)

A public intolerant of inaccurate reporting keeps the journalist on his toes, for though he may and should defend his opinion at the risk of losing readers, if he holds it strongly, bolstered by reason, no one can defend a misstatement of fact and should welcome its correction.

Readers should beware of judging opinions by association or by the search for personal motives. By association the reader argues: Mr. X, who is a communist, argues that democracy does not live up to its claims in respect to negroes. Mr. Y says the same thing. Therefore, Mr. Y is a communist.

Or Mr. X, a dyed-in-the-wool reactionary, is against the surplus-profits tax; Mr. Y, posing as a liberal, opposes it too; ergo, Mr. Y is a tool of reactionary interests.

This gets us nowhere. For it is conceivable that the gentlemen may agree on pure observation and reason on one thing, while disagreeing on almost everything else. What people write should be judged on its own merits, and not through association or the search for personal motives.

A free press is indeed a press which appeals to reason in the light of facts, and one in which ownership and direction respect truth and reason. In our country it seeks to pay its bills by pleasing readers. And if readers also respect truth, they will keep it free and make it more so.

PROPOSED HOME FOR JEWS

Do any substantial number of the homeless want to go to Surinam? The answer is yes. The dream of mass immigration to Palestine has become a thing of the past. Many have indicated their eagerness to go to Surinam. The first problem is getting there, which takes money.

A specially selected commission, visiting Surinam to study its possibilities for Jewish colonization, was enthusiastically favorable. With proper health and sanitary measures, Surinam can become a productive, tropical paradise.

"Mr. Ruddyfuddy uses scissors," said Grandmother.

The stranger stopped looking at himself in the mirror and laughed. It was a strong, reckless laugh, the kind she'd expected he'd have. He walked toward her. The man was tall, but when he stood in front of Grandmother he had to look up at her.

"I'm six foot one inch," said the stranger. "How tall are you?"

"Six feet two and a half inches," said Grandmother.

"You're a fine figure of a woman," said the stranger.

"If you want more doughnuts," said Grandmother, "why don't you say so?"

The stranger laughed again and sat down at the table. Grandmother put doughnuts on his plate and dusted them with 4X sugar. The man began to eat.

JACOB SCHUSSLICH, the hired man, stuck his head in the kitchen door and saw the stranger. Jacob was so astonished he almost said, "Dihinker," in front of Grandmother. The stranger bit into a doughnut. His lips curled back from his strong white teeth as they sank eagerly into the sweet dough. Jacob shivered. The stranger chewed slowly and with enjoyment. Jacob began to chew in unison. The stranger swallowed. Jacob swallowed. The stranger's white teeth flashed and tore off another morsel.

"That a doughnut you're eating?" asked Jacob.

"You've got eyes, haven't you?" said Grandmother.

Jacob came the rest of the way into the kitchen. He watched the stranger finish his doughnut. "They smell good."

Grandmother took two more doughnuts from the tray and put them on a plate. She handed the plate to Jacob and returned to her place in front of the stove. Jacob sat down beside the stranger and continued to stare at him. The stranger stopped eating. His black eyes seemed to burn into Jacob's soul. His arm stretched out, took a doughnut from Jacob's plate and put it beside the two on his own plate. He reached into his pocket, withdrew a shining penny and dropped it through the hole in the center doughnut. Jacob heard the penny clink on the plate. The stranger moved the two end doughnuts slowly back and forth without touching or moving the middle one.

"Tell me which doughnut it's under and you can have both of mine."

"The middle one," said Jacob.

"If you're wrong I get both of yours," said the stranger.

"The middle one," said Jacob.

The man lifted the middle doughnut. There was no penny. "It's a game of skill." He reached over and took the second doughnut off Jacob's plate.

Lightning cracked across the window. "Dihinker!" said Jacob, and jumped. He looked at his empty plate, and he looked at the stranger's four doughnuts. "Mrs. Ruddyfuddy ——"

Grandmother walked to the table. She took two doughnuts from the stranger's plate and handed them to Jacob. "Now stop bothering me." She walked back to the stove. The stranger sat and smiled sardonically at Jacob.

Outside, darkness pressed against the house and it began to rain—big drops, widely spaced, that fell with a plop. The wind rose and the rain beat down faster. Grandfather came running in from the barn and burst into the kitchen. He stopped when he saw the stranger.

THE FAMOUS DRY MUSTARD USED BY FINE COOKS EVERYWHERE

The stranger stood up. "Good evening, sir."

"Good evening," said Grandfather.

"I was caught in the storm," said the man, "and took the liberty of asking to spend the night."

"Well?" said Grandfather doubtfully. He looked at the saturnine face, the high forehead, the startlingly white skin.

"I've already told him he could," said Grandmother.

"In that case, you're very welcome." Grandfather extended his hand. "I'm Napoleon Ruddyfuddy."

The stranger put out his hand. "I'm Rudolph ——"

"What!" said Grandmother.

"Smith," said the man.

"Rudolph," said Grandmother, and paused. "Rudolph." She tried the name again and seemed to like it. "Rudolph, you'll take the room next to Jacob's. There's clean sheets on the bed."

"Thank you," said Rudolph. "Good night."

"Breakfast's at six," said Jacob. He led the way to the stairs, and stopped. It was very dark. "You go first," said Jacob. Rudolph shouldered his way by Jacob and went up the steps.

Grandmother banked the kitchen stove for the night and made sure all the windows were locked. Grandfather sat and watched her. She wound the cuckoo clock and took a last look around the kitchen. "I'm going to bed."

"I'll be up in a minute," said Grandfather.

Grandmother was undressed and sitting on the edge of the bed when Grandfather came upstairs. He took his time about getting ready and couldn't seem to make up his mind what he wanted to do. Grandmother waited impatiently to turn out the light. Finally he got his nightshirt on.

"Hurry up," said Grandmother.

Grandfather stood in the middle of the room in his bare feet. "I've half a mind to go out to the shop and bring in the shotgun."

"If you do, you'll sleep somewhere else," said Grandmother. "Come to bed."

Grandfather climbed into bed. "I'm not sure I like that fellow's looks."

"He is a handsome man," said Grandmother, and switched out the light.

Sometime in the middle of the night, Grandmother woke with a start. She sat up in bed and listened. Grandfather was snoring gently, and his whiskers floated up and down on top of the covers. In the distance, thunder worried the darkness like a dog with a bone. Somewhere in the house there had been a noise. She was almost certain of it. She slipped out of bed, pulled on her shoes and drew a light shawl over her shoulders. Quietly she tiptoed out of the room.

Halfway down the stairs, she stopped and listened. The house was black and silent. Perhaps she'd been dreaming. Maybe Grandfather's fears had her imagining things. She hesitated and considered going back. No, while she was about it she might as well look. The ends of the shawl were in her hands and she pulled it tighter around her shoulders. She took hold of the stair rail and felt her way cautiously down the steps. The stair carpet muffled her footfalls. Everything was so quiet she began to think of buzz saws and of being tied across railroad tracks in front of onrushing trains. Humph, said Grandmother, and shook herself. What nonsense. She extended her foot cautiously and stepped into the hall. Bang! Something hit her sharply across the legs. Grandmother let out a yell and kicked violently. In the dark something fell with a crash.

Grandmother felt along the wall, found the switch and snapped on the light. A kitchen chair lay sprawled and cracked on the floor from where Grandfather had placed it on the bottom step.

I might have known, said Grandmother. The old fool.

Behind her at the top of the stairs, Rudolph spoke. "Is anything wrong, Mrs. Ruddyfuddy? I heard you call." He had a blanket wrapped around him and came down the stairs. "Can I be of assistance?"

"Yes," said Grandmother. "Get the arnica."

She painted her shins with the medicine, thanked Rudolph and returned to her bedroom.

Grandfather stirred restlessly and mumbled, "Sha—shall I get the shotgun?" Grandmother ignored him and got into bed. She was almost asleep when Grandfather woke up. He sat erect, white whiskers bristling, and put a hand on her shoulder. He shook her violently. "Mother, did you scream?"

"Oh, drat!" said Grandmother. "Hairbreadth Harry!"

"What?" asked Grandfather.

"Nothing." Grandmother yanked the covers around her shoulders. "Go to sleep."

The next morning when Grandmother got up it was still raining, but the wind had shifted and she was more hopeful about the bazaar. She cooked breakfast for Grandfather and Jacob while they made pointed remarks about their guest's tardiness. Grandmother refused to notice them and put a plate of bacon and eggs in the oven to keep warm. Jacob clumped out into the rain to feed the chickens. Grandfather looked at the weather, guessed he'd do some things in the workshop, and left the kitchen.

Grandmother decided she'd make black-walnut doughnuts for the cake sale. She took her cookbook from the shelf and spread it open on the table. Originally it was a blank copybook, but over the years Grandmother had written in new recipes as she learned them, or without regard to alphabetical arrangement had stuck loose bundles of clippings between the pages. She put on her spectacles and began to leaf through the book. Shoofly pie—calico cake—macaroon custard; she came to a bundle of clippings. The recipe for black-walnut doughnuts wasn't on a clipping, but Grandmother couldn't resist looking at all of them. Cream sauce—apple fritters—drop cakes. Grandmother stacked the clippings and pushed them into the book. She turned a page—"Mrs. Nissly's Funeral Board Cake." Grandmother hesitated. She could imagine the expressions on the faces of the Ladies' Aid Society if she arrived with a dozen "Funeral Board Cakes." The idea appealed to her, but she discarded it. After all, the bazaar was to make money for a new window, and cakes made on Mrs. Nissly's recipe wouldn't attract many customers.

Rudolph came into the room. He was newly shaved, and his skin was fresh and white against his black hair. He smiled at her and apologized for being late. Grandmother smiled back, got the plate out of the oven and returned to her book.

Jacob stamped in from feeding the chickens. His shoes were soaking wet, and he squished muddy water all over the floor.

Grandmother looked up from her book. "Why aren't you wearing rubber boots?"

Jacob sneezed loudly. "I let Mr. Smith have them." He hesitated. "It seemed the Christian thing to do."

"Was it a game of skill?" demanded Grandmother.

"He said it was." Jacob sneezed again. "It's called Spit in the Ocean."

"Rudy!"

"Yes, ma'am," said Rudolph. He left his bacon and eggs and went upstairs with Jacob to return the boots to him.

While Rudolph finished his breakfast, Grandmother sifted flour into the biggest bowl she could find. She beat six eggs, added sour milk, salt, molasses, butter, nutmeg, baking powder and chopped black walnuts, and poured them into the flour. She sat down, put the bowl between her knees and began to stir.

"Let me do that," said Rudolph. He took the heavy bowl from her.

"You'll get all floury," said Grandmother.

She helped Rudolph take off his coat, and tied a big apron around him. He mixed the dough while she put the kettle of deep fat on the stove and brought it to a boil. Grandmother told him to scrape the contents of the bowl onto the breadboard, then she rolled it flat with the rolling pin. Rudolph used the cutter and sliced out rings of dough. Grandmother noticed he knew enough to dip the tin cutter in flour before he used it, so the dough wouldn't stick to the tin.

"How many doughnuts are we making?" asked Rudolph.

"Twenty dozen," said Grandmother. "They'll bring fifty cents a dozen at the bazaar this afternoon."

"Ten dollars for all this work!" Rudolph was astonished.

"Every bit helps," said Grandmother. "The window costs one hundred and ten dollars."

Rudolph continued to mix bowls of batter for Grandmother to fry. The pile of doughnuts mounted. He took one and bit into it.

"Stop eating those doughnuts," said Grandmother.

RUDOLPH munched the doughnut and watched Grandmother work. "Can't we at least get a dollar a dozen for them?" he asked.

"Not for doughnuts in Lancaster County," said Grandmother.

Rudolph took another doughnut. "You know, I'd like to come with you to the bazaar."

"You!" Grandmother stared at him in astonishment.

"I can help carry the doughnuts," said Rudolph. "I used to when I was little."

She looked at Rudolph and tried to picture him at the Ladies' Aid Society. Then she thought of the Funeral Board Cake and how she'd had to give it up. "You could wear one of Mr. Ruddyfuddy's clean shirts," she speculated.

If teaching and learning have a practical goal and a patriotic function, it is this: to keep the men who run our national plant from being run by it—that is, to keep them men or, even better, to keep them artists.

JACQUES BARZUN: Teacher in America, Atlantic Monthly Press (Little, Brown & Company).

"I can even sell doughnuts," said Rudolph.

"Go in the pantry and take off your pants," said Grandmother. "I'll [illegible] while you mix the rest of that batter."

"Madam!" said Rudolph.

"Go on," said Grandmother. "You sit in the chair while you stir. The [illegible] cover you."

By noon the doughnuts were all finished and it had stopped raining. Grandmother packed great baskets and covered them with snowy white napkins, then she called Grandfather to come and get dressed.

Grandfather came through the [illegible] and saw Rudolph immaculate in [illegible] white shirt and well-creased pants. His coat was draped over the back of a chair and a white handkerchief peeped out of the breast pocket. Grandfather went upstairs and decided to put on his best gray suit. He put on a white shirt with tiny pleats down the front, then he pulled on his gray pants and adjusted the suspenders over his shoulders. The suspenders had black-and-white stripes. Grandfather selected a pair of sleeve garters to match the suspenders. He tugged at his shirt sleeves until they bloused nicely above the sleeve garters. He looked himself over, then turned toward the mirror. Grandmother was finished centering her cameo pin and was putting on her hat. Grandfather started looking for his shoes. He went to the closet and peered in. He crossed to the bureau and searched on either side of it. Then he got down on his knees and looked under the walnut bed.

"Somebody's taken my black shoes!"

Grandmother [illegible] fully adjusted [illegible] "Rudy's [illegible] them."

Grandfather [illegible] his head. "Ouch!" crawled from under bed and brushed knees. "Those are best shoes."

"You could not expect an elegant [illegible] man like that to work shoes," said Grandmother calmly.

"While he's at the bazaar you'd better watch the cashbox," said Grandfather [illegible] and rubbed his head.

Grandmother finished the hat to her satisfaction. "I'll put a chair over it," she walked out of the room.

The Ladies' Aid Society stared at the woman when the Ruddyfuddys arrived at the bazaar. Rudolph jumped out of the buggy and offered his hand to Grandmother.

"What a fascinating-looking man!" said Miss Azaela Parker.

"I wonder Mr. Ruddyfuddy stands for it," said Miss Peachy Parker.

Grandmother descended from the carriage, lawn beside the little brownstone church dotted with trestle tables. She took her time until she found one that suited her. "We'll put them over there," said Grandmother.

Grandfather and Rudolph followed her, carrying the baskets. Grandmother took off her gloves and unpacked the doughnuts. She arranged them in blocks of a dozen each. She had a pile of paper bags and she set a shoe box on the table as a cashbox. Immediately business was very brisk. Grandfather waited for a while, then drifted off to pitch horseshoes. At each sale Grandmother would wrap the doughnuts in a bag while Rudolph collected the money and made change out of the shoe box. A few of the ladies weren't sure they received the right amount of change, but Rudolph's "Thank you, madam," was so polite they didn't like to say anything.

By the time the first rush was over, more than half the doughnuts were sold. Grandmother was very pleased and guessed that next time she visited some of the other booths herself. She told Rudy to mind the table while and not to get the doughnut sugar on his coat sleeves. Rudolph said he'd be careful and Grandmother left him. Rudolph counted the money in the shoe box. It came to [illegible] dollars. That left eight dozen at fifty cents a dozen to go. He put his hand in the

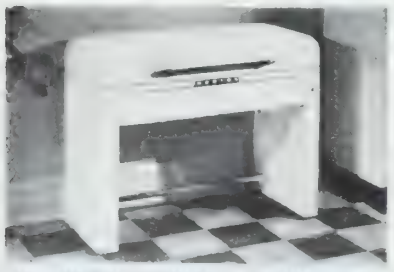
This is the ironing Mrs. Kuhns did on her Horton Portable Ironer.

"I have time and energy for fun with Edward—even on ironing day!"



"An actual test proved to me that I could do my ironing in just about half the time with a Horton Ironer. The folks at Horton asked me to do a week's ironing two ways—once with a hand iron—then with my Horton Ironer*—keeping an accurate record of my time. With the hand iron it took me 4 hours and 18 minutes. The next day I did the identical ironing on my Horton and it only took me 2 hours and 15 minutes—a saving of more than an hour and a half!

"I always knew the Horton was quicker! But for me, the big thing was the amount of energy it saved. Even my husband's heavy work clothes go through easily—I never have to exert any pressure, the ironer does that—and I can do things with my ironer that I couldn't begin to do by hand. I just couldn't keep house without my Horton."

For happier ironing days—days of new leisure when your ironer does the work while you sit in comfortable ease and guide the clothes—see your dealer who displays the sign below! Ask him to arrange a free demonstration and trial of any Horton Ironer in your own home.

There is a Horton Ironer for every home, every need, every purse . . . there is a Horton Ironer for YOU!

After the first ironing, the clothes were rerinsed and made ready for the second ironing.*

lifted the money and let it run through his fingers.

"Ahem!" Rudolph looked up. Miss Azaela Parker stood before the table. She looked demurely at the doughnuts. Miss Peachy Parker stood protectingly behind Miss Azaela and looked at Rudolph.

"Madam," said Rudolph, "how would you like me to give you a dozen doughnuts?"

Miss Azaela blushed violently. "But they're worth fifty cents." Nervously she tucked a graying curl under her bonnet.

Rudolph took three doughnuts and placed them on the table in front of Miss Azaela. He selected a penny from the shoe box and dropped it in the hole of a doughnut. "It's a game of skill," said Rudolph. "If you tell me which doughnut covers the penny, you get a dozen free. If you don't guess it, you give me fifty cents and try again." He slid the doughnuts back and forth in front of Miss Azaela. Wordlessly she extended her hand and touched a doughnut. "Madam, you've a keen eye." He lifted the doughnut and the penny flashed before them. Rudolph put a dozen doughnuts in a paper bag and handed them to Miss Azaela.

"Let me try." Miss Peachy brushed Miss Azaela aside.

"Put down your fifty cents," said Rudolph.

Big Ears Washburn stopped to watch. Miss Peachy tried and lost. She tried again and failed. Miss Azaela tittered. Miss Peachy put a third fifty-cent piece on the table with a bang. Rudolph moved the doughnuts. Miss Peachy pointed to the one in the middle.

"That's not the one," said Big Ears.

"It is too."

"It's the one on the left," insisted Big Ears.

"The gentleman has a good eye," said Rudolph. He lifted the doughnut on the left. The penny lay under it. "Try again; we won't count that one."

Miss Peachy tried and won. Rudolph put a dozen doughnuts in a bag and handed them to her.

Big Ears set the edge of his fifty-cent piece on the table and spun it. "All right, brother, I'll take a dozen free doughnuts."

Rudolph put the penny in a doughnut and slid the three doughnuts back and forth.

"Darn," said Big Ears. He spun another fifty cents on the table.

"Perhaps you'd like to put something on the side," Rudolph suggested. He took a dollar from the shoe box and tossed it on the table.

"Suits me, brother." Big Ears threw a dollar on the table.

"The next time," said Rudolph, "you can try it for five dollars." He slid the doughnuts back and forth.

WHEN Grandmother returned the table was bare. Rudolph was folding the napkins and putting them in a basket.

"Rudy, how many doughnuts did you eat?" demanded Grandmother.

"Three," said Rudolph. Then he laughed. "May I smoke?"

Career

By Catherine Haydon Jacobs

For her they dreamed an early-famed career
Beyond the calm of academic halls;
From an imagined tower, they could hear
The prance of Pegasus beneath gray walls.
They saw her ride across the open way,
And climb to hilltops never touched before.
Each fair dream perished when, one summer day,
A lover drew in rein outside her door.
Why should their hopes be crushed and unfulfilled
Because they cannot know her published fame?
Cannot they see the radiance she gives
Where wifely arts are summoned forth to build?
A mother is a poet in God's name;
Her work, a noble masterpiece that lives!

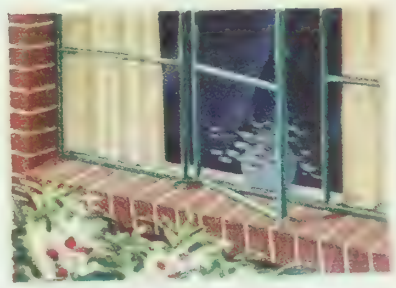
The U·S·S trade-mark shown at the left is one of a family of trade-marks. Some say "Premier Spring Wire" or "Vitrenamel" or "Stainless Steel" . . . but all are the same color, all have the big letters U·S·S prominently displayed. Whenever you see these letters — U·S·S — the trade-mark of United States Steel—you know the steel is good.



STEEL IS STRONG... STEEL LASTS LONGER... and this trade-mark means the product is made of quality steel

EVER stop to think how many articles made of steel we take for granted but would be lost without? Steel comes close to being the "indispensable material" today. In the home alone, scores of things, from furnaces and ductwork to kitchen equipment and coat hangers, get their strength, efficiency, long life and good looks from steel. And here's a rule to remember: whenever you see the U·S·S trade-mark on any product made of steel, you know the steel in that article is good steel.

STAYS BRIGHT always . . . corrosion-resistant cutlery of U·S·S Stainless Steel.

Come into my Kitchen

By Kingsley Kahler Hubby

NO. 1 SERIES BY HOUSEWIVES

The day-by-day meals of actual housewives, cooking in their own kitchens, who have agreed to share the benefits of their experience with other JOURNAL readers. They make no pretensions, but do the best jobs they know how to do, to provide their families with healthful food, frequently on limited budgets.

"I try to give my family what they like best, no matter how familiar it may be."

I HAVE been called from the range by enough emergencies such as cuts, bruises and other mishaps to understand that it is neither practical nor economical to risk foods or time in the interests of culinary artistry. Our meals are of necessity easy to prepare and reasonably economical.

My children may be unusual in that they like recognizable foods, in taste as well as sight, but I doubt it. If it's leftover meat we are having, they want to know it and to recognize it from its former state. I have thrown away almost without exception the concoctions I have made painstakingly and on the best authority, in which any ingredient fails to retain its outlines and flavor.

I have given up, through sad experience, the recipes that demand constant watching, a superabundance of expensive ingredients or time-consuming preparation.

My efforts are all directed by a desire to improve the stand-bys that constitute our diet. I may seem to lack imagination in that I try to give my family what they like best to eat, no matter how familiar it may be, but they invariably display more satisfaction and pleasure in these repeats than in the occasional novelties I serve them.

I use an inexpensive diary in the kitchen for engagements, guests, menus, as well as shopping lists and reminders. At a glance I can recall what was fed to whom, avoiding repetition as well as refreshing my memory on successful menus.

LAZY MEAL

A disgracefully lazy meal, and one that is easy on the budget, too, is based on tuna-fish casserole. Potatoes and a pan of corn bread (made from a package mix) go in the oven with the casserole. For dessert, apple crisp or crunch (most cookbooks have this). A green salad or a frozen vegetable completes the menu and is the only item not utilizing the oven's heat.

Tuna-Fish Casserole

Place in a casserole 1 can tuna fish broken up with a fork, 1 can condensed mushroom soup, ½ cup milk. This can be made with or without benefit of buttered crumbs. Place in an oven where potatoes are already baking, and in which the dessert has reached completion. Bake half an hour.

FAMILY TREAT

Another easy menu that meets with popularity begins with chile con carne, with which I serve sour cream and cottage cheese mixed in equal proportions. Then coleslaw made with red cabbage, Italian bread (sliced but left as a loaf, brushed with butter or margarine and garlic and warmed in the oven until crisp), and macaroon-Bavarian cream (or any other cool and not too sweet dessert). Coffee, of course. For a quick dessert, add two tablespoons of instant coffee to a package of prepared vanilla pudding. Chopped marrons glacés added to the whipped cream served with it give a fillip to this dessert.

There are probably as many beliefs about making chile as there are about mint juleps, and I humbly submit the following recipe, the result of many experiments, which serves eight amply but should be halved for a family of fewer than six.

Chile Con Carne

Brown slowly in a little fat 6 medium onions, sliced, and 2 pounds ground beef. Break the meat with a fork until thoroughly cooked, then add 2 cans tomatoes, two cans kidney beans

Quick Tricks for Harried Housewives

- I am no longer bothered by "what-is-its" in glass jars in the refrigerator. I mark the jar with a china-marking crayon when I put leftovers away. Not a bad idea to add the date too.
- We use rubber stamps with each child's name boldly printed thereon, and an indelible-ink pad, for quick and permanent marking. It is clearly legible after countless launderings on underwear, pajamas and shirts. It is good for insides of rubbers and galoshes and raincoats and immediately identifies sometimes disputed ownership of games, toys and schoolbooks.
- Rub a little soap over the bottoms of coffeepots and frying pans before using over outdoor grills. Smoke and grime wash off easily.
- When the tip comes off one of the youngster's shoelaces, use your clear nail polish to stiffen the end. Saves time and temper in the morning struggle of dressing.
- When the baby is beginning to eat solid foods all its clothing, its mother's clothing and the room for a radius of six feet seem to bear the strain. My solution of this cleaning problem has been to divest the tot of clothing and recline him on the support in the bathinet at mealtimes. With a protective apron on myself most of my previous work has been eliminated. The bath hour can usually be moved an hour or so to follow the feeding during this period of introduction to spoon feeding, which makes more sense than bathing before the big mess!
- A bit of baby oil rubbed on the baby's face before feeding will make face washing easier. Some baby cereals harden like plaster, and all babies hate forceful scrubbing.
- When I buy towels and washcloths, I have found it costs very little to have them marked with the children's names in bright-colored script (embroidered by machine). Identification encourages neatness and eliminates argument.

and chili powder. (Adding chili powder is a matter of personal preference. A tablespoon should be average for the above, although some like it hotter.) Season with 3 teaspoons salt, and pepper to taste. Simmer over direct heat for two hours. My greatest contribution to this recipe is my conviction that chile is best the day after it is made. It should be well cooked and allowed to cool overnight, then warmed for at least half an hour before serving. The taste and consistency are far superior to those of chile recently prepared.

Macaroon-Bavarian Cream

Line a mold with stale macaroon crumbs which have been soaked in fruit juice (I use sherry). Pour in a Bavarian-cream mixture made from recipe in any cookbook, and chill.

FISH DINNER

For any menu, the specification nearest to my heart is that it be simple of preparation. When we have fish, I start with a clear soup followed by poached fish served with hot mayonnaise, browned potatoes and chopped spinach. For dessert, Indian pudding. If any spinach is left, make a cream of spinach soup and add grated cheese while heating.

Clear Soup

For this I either boil a can of tomatoes and an equal amount of water with a cut-up onion, a few stalks of celery, seasoning, and then strain it, or I use canned mixed vegetable juices, hot.

Poached Fish

A thick halibut steak (or any other firm white fish) poached in water that has boiled fifteen minutes with bay leaves, celery, parsley, carrots or any other herbs, and salt and pepper. Serve with hot mayonnaise.

Hot Mayonnaise

Warm over boiling water homemade or prepared mayonnaise. Prepared mayonnaise may be improved by the addition of lemon juice and seasonings.

For Robert, Out-of-Doors

By Marjorie Lederer Lee

I never saw the road so wide
The day that Robert took a ride,
Nor knew a maple half as tall,
As crimson-leafed in any fall!
And who is there so worn, so cold,
As now could tell me, "Fall is old!"
Or—"Autumn skies are always clear!"
Or—"Maples crimson every year!"
There's no such thing as common fare
When Robert reaches in the air
To catch a sunbeam; every part
Of life is new, and at its start . . .

Steel-eyed cynic, hold your tongue
That all the world is oversung!
How can a place become a bore
Where nothing has been done before?

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

If I must divulge the whole truth, I use the tiny new potatoes that come in cans and brown them lightly in vegetable shortening, either in a frying pan or in the oven. Any favorite green may be used. I find spinach frozen and prechopped the simplest.

Indian Pudding

I make this according to the recipe found in my cookbooks, but I use twice the amount of spice called for. With 1 cup molasses I use 1 teaspoon each of cinnamon, nutmeg and mace, and ½ teaspoon each of ginger and allspice.

HOT-WEATHER MENU

One of our favorite hot-weather meals features cold veal paprika, starts with borsch—hot or cold, but minus the sour cream because of that used in the veal. With this we have a salad of slices of avocado and any melon—cantaloupe, watermelon or honeydew—and popovers. For dessert, meringue glacé. Homemade meringues are a command dessert in our house. Two egg whites make a good supply of small ones. I usually make them when we are having hollandaise sauce, to use both parts of the egg.

Cold Veal Paprika

Sauté 2 pounds veal in butter or margarine in which a little garlic has been browned and removed. When the veal is brown on all sides, add 1 cup water or stock, and salt and pepper. Cover and simmer one hour. Chop or grind the me[at], re[move] the range, add 1 cup sour cr[eam], a[dd] prika to taste. Blend thoroughly, [and] chill overnight.

SWAPPER'S LUCK

way home. Might not mention it, might not even think of it really, but you know how it is. We speculated about things like that; and if you've ever been on this kind of trip, you'll know exactly what I mean.

Antiques defy you. Try to resist a country antique shop. Out in the old red barn back of the low-roofed house stands a wooden horse fifteen feet high and colored as no horse on earth was ever bedecked. Or shining windows filled with old glass and ancient bottles may catch your eye and do things to your pocketbook. Old books and trays and shining brass are covered with no film of dust. No, sir. Each thing is spick-and-span and ready to go along with you. It would be all right if there were one antique shop, one such with tearoom attached. But there are a dozen—or more—and even if it's nowhere near any meal hour, we're hungry. We are there. We would make errand to stay. Until lunch or dinner or whatever they called their noontime meal. We were too weak, mentally and physically anyway. We stayed.

Mostly begging. Now you can buy an antique or a meal and pay for it and be on your way. But on this trip I had been doing something else besides. Gentle hints that I had a lot of nerve, or that my crust was colossal, didn't stop me. I kept right on and made out all right. Had to do some swapping so maybe it was a gentle racket, but we all had a good time and I'm going to pass along to you some of the collection I made as we traveled those quiet country roads or stopped by in a little city that made us feel at home. For I collected some of the receipts we sampled on our leisurely journey. And if you don't think it's quite a trick to get some up-and-coming tearoom lady to give you a choice bit, or to persuade that nice old lady, who had the kind of house you'd like to pick up as is and take right home, to share her secrets. Well!

A little trade helps. Such as these are sweet, they are charming, they'll explain Aunt Hetty's hair wreath and the quilt on the parlor bed, but receipts? "Well, dearie, I don't rightly know. Folks have so many highfalutin modern conveniences now" (this from one old lady) "that I'd feel sorta queer to have my New England succotash made with things that blow whistles and ring bells when they're done or need turning over or something. But if you think you can make it in the old-fashioned way, I'll try to set down the secret, as you call it. It ain't really. Everybody in this town knows it and some of 'em make it. I won't say how well, but when the corn-and-bean season is on, the men begin to talk about succotash. And there's church suppers coming along and practice don't hurt none, as you'll find out." So here it is, just as I got it from headquarters, and you're welcome!

OLD-HOMESTEAD SUCCOTASH SUPPER

Simmer a fowl or roasting chicken until tender. Also simmer a 4-pound piece of brisket corned beef very slowly to tenderness. (I wrap this in cheesecloth before cooking. It keeps it firm.) It takes 4 to 6 hours. Pour off the water it's cooked in after 1 hour of simmering and add fresh water. Do this beef-and-chicken cooking the day before you plan to have the succotash. Let the chicken and beef cool in their own broths overnight. Skim the fat from both broths the next day. Save some of the broth of each to reheat chicken and beef later. To the rest of the chicken broth add as much corned-beef broth as seems most palatable. Taste as you add. In this broth cook 4 pounds fresh Lima beans (4 pounds before shelling). In the winter, canned corn, dried Limas or dried yellow-eyed beans are country fare with this dish. August and September are the season for fresh Limas and corn. Score kernels of 2 dozen ears fresh corn with a sharp knife. Scrape out the creamy substance with the back of a knife. Add to the beans in the broth. Season and let cook a few minutes. Remove the skin and bones from the chicken—leaving the chicken in good-sized pieces. Slice the corned beef. Heat up both in the broth. Add the corn and beans and their broth and season to taste, but fairly high. Beans and such need a boost. Serve from a tureen. Provide deep soup plates or bowls, but never a cup in sight.

Right out of the sea. Now there weren't any nice white muslins at any windows at the place where we stopped almost in the dooryard of the Atlantic Ocean. That ocean has a possessive air, and the day we were there, toward sundown, I thought it was going to move right in and take over.

Reassurance from the boss. "Now don't worry. She don't never come no higher. Drive your car up back of the shack and I'll have the cook see what's for supper. Just make yourselves to home and don't work up no appetite. Been clamming today and had the lobster pots to look to and I'm right empty. But you folks hold on. We don't serve 'family' meals. This here now is a tea-room."

So we waited. I won't keep you, but I'll tell you about that supper if it's the last thing I do. The old chap let down from the side of the shack on the porch a long table. Seat about twelve. When it was set up it held pickle jars and jelly dishes and all the relishes you could think of or our host could imagine, I guess. He was all spruced up now in spotless white, and when his "little woman" came out to greet us, she was as immaculate as one of those lovely polished shells they used for all sorts of things around that place.

CONQUERORS

The exasperated man who does not say what he might so easily have said.

All who do a day's work they detest.

Any who hide a sorrow.

The failures who never give in.

—H. L. GEE: Another Cheerful Day (Methuen & Co.).

We get famished—and called. Just in time we were summoned to the table. This is what we found when we sat down. Every place taken with faces as hungry as ours. A lot of joshing between host and guests about what a poor night it was, but things didn't pan out.

A great basket of hot rolls that melted in your mouth was passed from guest to guest—and replenished, like magic. Beautiful country butter, yellow as a field of buttercups. It's awfully easy to eat enough of these to spoil your appetite for what's to come. So we got a few rolls to take with us and sat back still starving.

Now came platters of broiled lobster, with everything that goes with them—little jugs of that same butter, melted and hot, potato puffs (I won't describe, but I got the receipt for them), more rolls, hot, hot, platters of stuffed clams as we shall call them, for I got that receipt too. This woman didn't mind a bit. She swapped.

Pie, cake, cheese. The desserts were marvelous and were not passed by a stingy waiter, but set, as everything was, on the table up and down and you just took. But Uncle Josh, as we were calling him now, came around the house with his wheelbarrow. And on it the biggest freezer of ice cream I ever hope to set eyes on and the most heavenly tasting—and I'm in doubt about tasting such again. And coffee—right through, all the time. Coffee? They said so. But it was ambrosia to us. And this was just a little snack. Eaten to the singing of the incoming tide. A hard place to leave.

No "floating oil" to get rancid

You can see and taste the difference!

You'll never find "floating oil" in delicious Peter Pan Peanut Butter! A secret process prevents the oil from separating, ever. That's important—separated oil soon gets rancid, causes unpleasant flavor, loss of nourishment. Ever-fresh Peter Pan keeps the same rich, fresh-roasted peanut flavor—the same body-building food values—as the day it was made. No oil separation means no stirring, no lumpy waste. Every last, tasty bit spreads smoothly with just the touch of a knife. And creamy-smooth Peter Pan Peanut Butter never sticks to the roof of your mouth. Try it, today.

gradually. Cook until thick, stirring constantly. Season with 1 teaspoon salt, a dash of pepper and ¼ teaspoon onion juice. Add ¾ cup grated sharp American or Cheddar cheese. Stir until the cheese is melted. Remove from the heat and stir in 1 slightly beaten egg yolk, ½ cup fine soft bread crumbs and ½ teaspoon chopped parsley. Lastly drain juice off 2 seven-ounce cans minced clams. Add clams to the sauce. (Fresh-opened clams chopped to a terrific fineness take a little longer, but are worth it. Stir over very low heat, so as not to toughen the clams, until the liquor forms well. Then strain the clams in sieve. Save all your clam juices for broth. Add the clams to the sauce as you did the canned clams.) Heap mixture in washed clamshells. Set in rock salt in long shallow pan—the jelly-roll pan is a good choice. Broil 3 minutes or until lightly tinged with brown. For home use, serve with lemon as a first course or as an appetizer. This makes 1½ dozen stuffed clams. The mixture may be made up ahead and broiled when needed. You can buy clamshells or dig them right by the wild waves roaring. Keep them nice and scrubbed out after you've used them and up on a high shelf out of the way of temptation, where they won't be used as ash trays!

One hot noontime. In a fine little inn up in the Berkshires, we parked with joy and gladness, as the old hymn says. It had come off hot, and that means hot. And under the great green maples of that memorable place, we lunched on a cool porch over a tempting brook. And we found that that brook held the brook trout that we caught as wanted. Fresh fish, those. We had icy drinks, crisp, hot, hard little biscuits, butter out of this world and then the trout. Broiled, mostly boned and skillfully done to keep the fish's shape, and served with potatoes sliced in country cream, and corn on the cob. You weren't asked. There were no menus. You ate and were thankful.

This is a meat loaf as is. I will share with you the receipt for a meat loaf that the white-haired, handsome woman who ran the place gave me. It came from her sister-in-law, who lived out in that grand state of Texas. She was nice about it, too, but my partner muttered "nerve" and kept right on eating. Especially corn. It's early up there. And as tender as a bride's first kiss. How good it is.

COLD CHICKEN-AND-TONGUE LOAF

Cook a 3-to-4-pound chicken in water until tender. Cool the stock and don't have too much. It thins out, and you can always make up with some good canned chicken broth. Skim all the fat. Take the meat from the bones. Put through the food grinder, using the coarse knife, or chop it if you have to—it's not so bad. Put a jar of beef tongue through the grinder, too, but keep both meats separate. Soak 2 envelopes unflavored gelatin in ½ cup cold water and let it get very soft. Add 3½ cups hot chicken stock and stir until the gelatin has dissolved. Hard cook and slice 6 eggs. Chop 1 bunch of parsley. Season the ground chicken (there should be 2½ cups) with 1 tablespoon salt, ¼ teaspoon black pepper and 1 small onion, grated. Add 1 cup diced celery. Mix with 1¼ cups of the stock to which you added the gelatin. Now season the ground tongue with 2½ teaspoons salt, ¼ teaspoon pepper, 1½ teaspoons dry mustard and 1 small onion, grated. Mix the seasoned tongue with 1 cup of the gelatin stock. Put a thin layer of the remaining gelatin stock in the bottom of a 2-quart loaf pan or other mold. Arrange slices of egg on top and sprinkle with finely chopped parsley. Add half the tongue mixture. Repeat with a layer of gelatin, sliced egg and chopped parsley. Pour on a little more gelatin stock over that. Let this set until almost firm. Add half the chicken mixture. Repe layers of egg, parsley and gelati tongue mixture and chicken mixtu all is used. Chill overnight. Unmol nish with tomatoes and cucumber tuce cups. This makes a large loaf won't last too long. Slice it thin—c nish, as all cold meats should be Try it and see.

I will share. Among the two salads I brought back here's a summe for still it's summer, and trips, like o winding up and folks do know whe live and you'd better be all set. So one for luncheon, supper, bridge p dinner. Makes you cool just to think it. Cooler to eat it.

Take from the oven and cool in the pans a few minutes. Now take the cakes out on racks and let them cool ready for frosting, filling and whatever doings you plan.

Pecan Filling. Mix 1 teaspoon cornstarch with ⅓ cup sugar. Cream together with tablespoons butter or margarine. Add 3 well-beaten egg yolks and ⅔ cup milk. Pour into the top of the double boiler and cook over hot water, stirring constantly until the mixture thickens. Add a pinch of salt and ½ teaspoon vanilla. Cool—and that means really cool. spoon vanilla. Shape in a 2-inch roll and chill until firm—takes several hours. Cut off ½-inch slices and roll out thin on a lightly floured pastry cloth. Fit into individual tart pans, smooth-sided or fluted. Bake 8–10 minutes in a hot oven, 400°F. Let the shells cool a bit in the pans to crisp them. Loosen gently with the tip of a pointed knife. Turn upside down and tap gently on the bottom to free them from the pans. Cool thoroughly on a rack. To serve, set mousses in chocolate shells—garnish with orange sections and coconut. Be sure of this: if the shells are not cooled in the pan, they will not hold their shape well when taken out. So go about some other job and forget them until they're as cool as a morning-glory. You'll get enough out of this receipt for at least 14 guests. And a bonus for chocolate cookies. Comes the day.

MERINGUE RING WITH ICE CREAM AND PEACHES

Beat the whites of 4 eggs with a pinch of salt until stiff but not dry. Add 1¼ cups powdered (real powdered that's back again and all you want) sugar, a tablespoonful at a time, beating well between each spoonful so the sugar will be well dissolved in the egg white. Last, add 1 teaspoon vanilla and ¼ teaspoon almond flavoring. Wet a thick board thoroughly with water. Cover with brown paper. With a pastry bag and rosette tube end, make a circle of meringue on the paper about 8–9 inches in diameter, or of a size to fit your chop plate. Go around again with the tube to make a base about 1½–2 inches wide. Go round and round, building it up to form a ring about 2 inches high. Sprinkle with slivered blanched almonds. Bake in a slow oven, 250°F. Bake until the meringue is crisp and a light beige color. This will take an hour or more, and you'd better be slow and also give those nuts a chance to take on a little flavor and color. You know. Turn the oven off and allow meringue to cool slowly in oven 1 hour. Put a wet cloth under paper and the meringue ring can easily be slid off the paper with spatulas onto a chop plate for serving. Fill the ring with vanilla ice cream. Pour sweetened sliced peaches over the ice cream.

Marriage always is, and even under happy circumstances is what Keyserling calls a tension. The tension is not to separate the pair but to hold them together; it can indeed be a tonic and strengthening bond; it may well be the necessary condition for the finest joys of marriage. What can be said for marriage is, not that it avoids tension, or escapes being a discipline, but that at the best its rewards are great.

Loot divided. Well, as I said, we are home. It's a wonderful feeling. Makes it pay to take to the open road.

My companion cannot resist an antique shop, big or little—little preferred. Patronized liberally on this trip. Tried to make me envious, but I had my loot. Written carefully down in my battered notebook.

Not envy but— No, it is not envy that prompts me to admire that little Lalique vase with a blue that ebbs and flows as you look at it, and as the light brightens or withdraws itself. That Dresden shepherdess was a stern necessity on our whatnot, and I know it. Besides, it was a terrific bargain, she having been bereaved of her shepherd a long time ago, and we didn't need a shepherd anyway.

We are satisfied and happy. So it is, on and on, new beauty from old into a home that is old and knowing. And I have my book. My swaps and my begging cost no money. It got me some pretty nice acquaintances, and they won't break. And I can use any or all of my collection at any time. But in the meantime, we're home. Home again. THE END

With clothes, the same camaraderie exists. So much trading goes on that friends tell by outfits who's home and who's away. When Posie appears in a gray-blue corduroy coat, they know Marilyn's back from Oregon State. If she's wearing a black topper, then Annie must be home. Ray, who dislikes the idea of their trading clothes, thought at last it was partly over when Annie and Marilyn went away, but says in a resigned tone, "Now they're shipping them back and forth."

The whole family feels the promise of the future—a happy future. Ray and Nellie miss more carefree days, sometimes, but they measure today's sacrifices in terms of tomorrow's satisfactions. They worry sometimes about their own future, but they never doubt that college itself is worth what they are giving up.

Paying for college has been like everything else with the Melsons—a family project. Ray never had the chance to save ahead. For twelve years when the children were small, he put more than $5000 into doctors' bills—a big lump for an income which, up until the war, averaged $3300 a year, depending on commissions. The same $5000 would almost have paid for the house when the new owner said "Buy or else," four years ago. Ray, who had hoped to continue renting the house until he could afford a place in the country, was forced to buy—and Nellie went back to teaching to get enough money for the $1950 down payment, and a debt of $700 borrowed earlier against Ray's life insurance. Since it was obvious that all three girls wanted to go to college, and couldn't without more money, Nellie continued teaching. Last year her salary of $2359.54 ran $87.10 short of paying the girls' educational expenses. This year, with Annie married, educational expenses will be cut $85 a month. Annie has given up the remaining two years of her three-year $1000-a-year scholarship from De Paul University. The money she received fr for room and board will be turned Posie, who has a $1000 scholarship Portland piano teacher, Miss Jessi who also helped Annie. Last year tended Reed, where the tuition is $ lived at home. Marilyn, at a state pays all her expenses, including tuiti less money than it cost Annie to live cago. Education will cost $500 less th with the extra money helping to b Ray and Nellie's "almost invisible" account.

Ray's job—selling aluminum cookin sils to stores and jobbers—hasn't c since his days at the University of W ton, where he was elected to Phi Beta top scholastic honor. He is making th est income he's ever made this year—b $4000 and $5000—but he's seeing les family, because of longer working hou less of his money. He's not sure wher goes, says, "We have gotten along what we needed, and then paying for i nothing would give me more security t operate on a definite budget. Mayb year I'll have time."

Ray's handiest answer to overdue b always been—more work. During th when Annie entered Reed, Ray was c to a desk job in the company's accounti partment, and for the second time things. During the First World War wanted to enlist, but was needed on the Now his income was lower than usual ($3000), his expenses higher. So he got as paper boy. For four months durin winter of 1943, he made $60 a month d ing the morning Oregonian to 165 neig hood families. He worked from 4 to 7 and when the going became too stren switched to evening and week-end wor the Railway Express Co. Here he loade press cars for 95 cents an hour, could

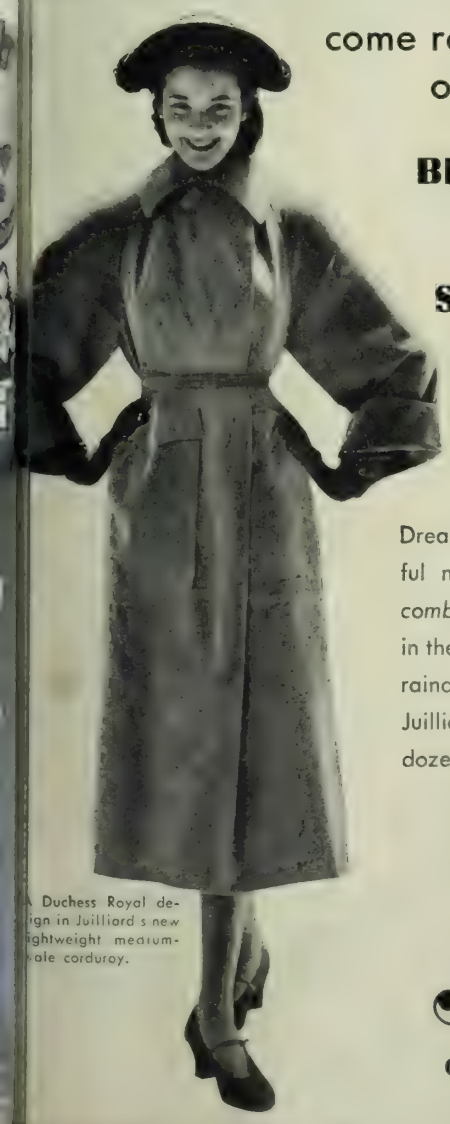
She saved $500 that summer it back to the same d the next summer, ched in late July to ı a sawmill where rked 9½ hours a day piling small f lumber. Getting the pieces into d then carrying the piles to a near-by was quite a trick. Annie adds, "I ked quite a sight as I set out for work lue jeans, sweat shirt and big bulky loves." But the job was fun. Annie's on the ripsaw was French Canadian, the saw ripped through the wood he Annie memorize her French irregular Sometimes she got to work early and on a lumber pile reading her summer , Santayana. She made $50 a week ed $200. On V-J Day the job ended y and Annie finished out the summer in a dress shop, where she made $85. summer she was nineteen Annie went ner school at Reed and earned $150 g-in books in the library, filing in the r's office, and waiting on tables. That she moved to Chicago and was lucky to share an artist's studio. This was a ful start in a new city. Annie met many artists and musicians, spent her dating time with "five violinists and a pianist," and on the side picked up $300 modeling for painters and commercial photographers.

Ordinarily each girl would work at school, but Annie and Posie haven't had time to work and practice too. Marilyn could, but, says Ray, who did four years of farm work himself before he could get to college, "If one girl works, all three should."

Marilyn has been working summers, however, ever since her first job at $34 a week in a shipyard purchasing department when she was sixteen. She is very clothes-conscious, was thrilled when she had enough money for a cashmere sweater. She discovered, "Buying things with your own money makes you value them more." The next year she answered a newspaper ad and ended up as "puffer" for a local dry cleaner, in charge of ironing the collars, sleeves and tops of dresses. Marilyn loved the job because she learned about clothes and fabrics—and because she could save $300 each of the three summers she worked there.

What sculpture is to a block of marble, education is to the soul. —ADDISON.

Posie was too young to cash in on the wartime salary and job boom as her sisters did. At sixteen, she became secretary to the secretary to the head of a machine shop, collected $25 a week, and bought eight $18.75 War Bonds. These are still cached away in the bank "for a trip sometime," but, says Posie regretfully, "I may need them to bolster up my wardrobe for Chicago."



The next summer she couldn't find a job until the fall, when she worked Saturdays as salesgirl in a dress shop. But in 1947 she was back at a steady job drying prints and sorting and mailing pictures for an advertising photography agency. She gave her father $347.10 that summer, but didn't like the job because the people were "messy and crazy."

This past summer Marilyn and Posie have been working on the College Advisory Board of a large Portland department store, where they help prospective freshmen pick out campus-clothing "musts." The salary is $125 a month plus a commission of 6¾ per cent on each sale after $125. The girls are running a friendly contest to see who can make the most, encouraged by the fact that last year Marilyn's roommate made $400 at the same job.

Nellie has the same incredible energy as her husband and children. When Ray couldn't spare money for living-room curtains, she earned $36 picking string beans for a commercial gardener on the north edge of town. Another summer she picked raspberries to collect $19 for a desk; and a third summer earned $61 toward a vacuum cleaner, picking and marketing strawberries.

Even clothes are a family enterprise. Nellie, who learned from her own mother, has taught the girls how to make not only blouses and dresses but tailored suits and coats. They buy good material, spend time finding the right pattern and doing a careful job of sewing and tailoring, and as a result have excellent clothes which really last. Nellie's four-year-old Forstmann wool coat, which cost $8 to make, is "still going strong." She and the girls make many hats, all the curtains. Marilyn generally has good luck on bargains at a local store's Friday Surprise Sale. Once she bought a strapless bathing suit reduced from $22.95 to $1, but says, "I found out why it was such a terrific reduction. Not one of us dares wear it!"

THE Melson alarm clock goes off briskly every weekday morning at 6:15 sharp. Nellie is the first one up—she goes to sleep fast, wakes up the same way—followed closely by Ray. Ray works automatically—pulls on his old brown bathrobe and worn brown leather slippers, brings in the Oregonian from the front porch and scans the front page quickly before starting the breakfast. Nellie is trotting barefooted ("I have no slippers, but I'd go barefooted anyway") between the bedroom and kitchen in her worn corduroy bathrobe, curlers in her hair, hurriedly dressing.

Nellie gets to school at 7:45, has an hour to prepare lessons for the day and do night-school homework. She arrives home about 5 by bus, and dinner is at 6:30, except for three nights a week, when she cooks a quick meal at 5 and leaves at 6:15 for a forty-five-minute trolley trip to night school.

Sunday is a day for "leisure, a big dinner, getting reacquainted with each other." But the Melsons still get up at 6:15, eat a late dinner, and have a "get your own" supper. Their bedtime is as early as their rising hour—usually 9:30. Most of the entertaining they do is for their daughters. They have a potluck dinner with four other couples once a month, bring friends home from church for dinner and a drive in the country, and, before Nellie's classes interfered, went to dancing class Monday nights. Now they enjoy their daughters' friends almost more than their own—"it keeps you young."

Posie's schedule in Chicago will closely follow Annie's of last year. Annie usually left her South Side apartment by 7:40 for a twenty-minute train trip to De Paul, in downtown Chicago, where she practiced and attended music-theory classes. She grabbed a candy bar for lunch, and rushed back to the University of Chicago for classes in physical sciences and English literature. Posie will concentrate on piano study and, like Annie, rush through dinner "with one hand on the piano and one hand on the plate."

The fact that Annie was living in an apartment where she didn't have the "group contact" that Marilyn has at Oregon State bothered Ray and Nellie. They still have a hard time understanding her intense devotion to music, and feel that she's letting it drive her too much. "We care more about Annie than her music. We don't want it to change her personality." They see chiefly that, according to their standards, she is becoming too self-centered, careless about manners and consideration of others. She spends hours at the piano, little time making friends, and when she's home little time seeing her family. Since her marriage to Willie, whose whole life is music, Annie has concentrated even harder on her career. Ray and Nellie think Willie is a fine person, but wish that Annie's life were "more regular." Because of the changes they see in Annie, they were hesitant about sending Posie to De Paul, but were convinced by Posie that "I could never subjugate myself to music as Annie does."

When these problems come up, Miss Lewis, who has taught both girls, usually becomes the arbiter. She has explained that if Annie is to become a concert pianist, she must submerge her social life and even her family contacts for the next few years. There is no other way.

Marilyn's life at Oregon State follows the general college pattern of classes, sorority functions, week-end dates and parties. She sleeps with the rest of the girls on a large sleeping porch loaded with double-decker beds, eats in the sorority dining room, has a heavy schedule of cooking and clothing classes. Ray and Nellie would have liked Annie and Posie to have this same training, which closely approximates Nellie's own studies. She had two years of normal school before she started teaching, was particularly interested in home-economics courses.

Nellie was home on vacation the hot July day in 1924 when a young salesman named Ray Melson asked her mother if he could put on a demonstration in her kitchen. As Ray tells it, Nellie kept saying, "No, don't"—but her mother agreed anyway. Ray showed how to cook a pot roast without water, and hot cakes without grease, and baked a cake on top of the stove, but says, "Everytime I stopped talking for even a second, Nellie would switch the conversation to something else." They finally got together when Nellie helped him wash the dishes. Soon they were conversing easily about their mutual interest, mountain climbing. They climbed Mount Baker together two weeks later, and inside of two months were engaged. Nellie says now, "If my daughters did that I'd say they were crazy." Ray was 26, Nellie 22.

They were married a year later in the living room of Nellie's home before forty guests. Nellie wore a short white Spanish-lace dress that she'd made herself; Ray had a new navy-blue suit. After the reception they drove to Canada to visit Ray's parents, hurried back so Ray wouldn't miss the beginning of his senior year, and Nellie could enroll in home-economics classes. They each contributed $500 to a joint bank account, and lived in a small campus apartment. Nellie was pregnant the last three months of that year—not an unusual sight today, perhaps, but definitely out of the ordinary then. When they moved to Portland two years later, their family was bigger by two, their bankbook flat, their outlook young and full of hope.

If Ray and Nellie have had a good married life, one big reason is the similarity of their own upbringings, and their complete accord on the way their daughters should grow up. Ray picked Nellie because "she was the kind of person who wanted a home and family."

She picked him for the same reason, and adds, "When I heard he was a Phi Beta Kappa, it made a big difference." They go to church regularly, disapprove of smoking and drinking, were strongly disciplined in their youth, and have disciplined their daughters firmly, although less strongly. They still expect the girls in from dates by 12:30. They have asked them not to smoke or drink, but told them, "If you must, please do it at home first." None do. When Annie wanted to join a high-school sorority, Ray said no—"They hurt more people than they help"—but later reversed himself for Marilyn because he thought she needed, then, the social confidence that a sorority gives.

Ray and Nellie have generally approved of and liked the girls' friends. With Posie and Annie, who've met and liked people who smoke and drink and have "liberal" leanings, there have been occasional difficulties. The girls try to see both sides of the question and do what they themselves think right. Usually they find themselves agreeing with their parents: "They've never asked us to do something they wouldn't do themselves. How can you disagree when their whole point of view is guided by your own future?"

The Melson sights are set on college for at least two more years. After that? Annie, Marilyn and Posie have a definite answer: "Time for mother and dad to use their money for themselves, have fun and get that house in the country. We've had our turn. They've waited overtime, already, for theirs."

In addition to the foregoing, an up-to-the-minute yearly health audit will include:

1. Blood-sugar test, where there is a family history of diabetes, or symptoms of the disease such as excessive hunger and thirst, itching in various parts of the body, loss of weight or persistent boils.

(A recent survey in a Massachusetts town indicated that for every four known cases of diabetes, there were three hitherto unknown. If these figures are correct and can be applied to the whole United States, something like a million Americans are running the risk of incurring diabetic gangrene, or going into a coma from which they may not recover.)

2. Electrocardiogram in all middle-aged and elderly persons, and in all others who have indications of heart disease, such as irregularity of the pulse and attacks of pain under the breastbone.

3. X ray of chest, when there is a family history of tuberculosis, or the patient has been exposed to the disease, or there are symptoms such as a cough, loss of weight, hoarseness, fatigue, afternoon fever and night sweats. (Such X-ray surveys of the general population have shown that one out of every hundred persons has unrecognized tuberculosis, or nearly two million in the whole population.)

4. X-ray and fluoroscopic examination of the stomach, gall bladder and bowel in all middle-aged women. This is important, since most cases of digestive disturbance in this age group are due to gall-bladder disease.

5. Vaginal examination and vaginal smear in all women of middle age and older, and when there are irregularities in the female functions.

Triple Trouble?

Yes, three can easily be a crowd, when it comes to choosing the right milk for infants. But this trio's doctor prescribed FORMULAC Infant Food, and they've thrived on it!

Doctors write us that they feed their own children on FORMULAC, as well as children under their care. One doctor says: "I have used FORMULAC for my own baby—and have prescribed it for many of my cases. I have found it to be an ideal milk for baby formulas."*

What is FORMULAC? This milk product—in convenient liquid form—contains all the vitamins and minerals a growing infant is known to need. It is an excellent formula basis for normal or difficult cases.

When baby is fed on FORMULAC, no cod liver oil or orange juice is necessary. The vitamins are in the milk itself. Simply add water and sugar, as your doctor directs.

This easy-to-prepare product avoids the danger of omitting the needed vitamins, or giving them in improper amounts. At drug and grocery stores everywhere.

Ask your doctor about this vitamin-and-mineral fortified baby food. He'll tell you FORMULAC has been clinically tested and proved—and that it has the acceptance of the Council on Foods and Nutrition of the American Medical Association.

now the diagnostician has at his command delicate and intricate instruments which probe into nearly every part of the body, reveal to him the state of affairs there, and often procure material for biopsy as well.

Thus, continued hoarseness calls for examination by the laryngoscope, a tube with a light, which can be passed into the larynx. Coughing, and perhaps pain in the chest, sometimes betoken lung cancer. In addition to X ray, study by bronchoscope is indicated, an apparatus that goes far down into the lung. Even though a cancer may be beyond the reach of the "eye" of the bronchoscope, secretions can be sucked up and tested for malignant cells, and many a lung cancer has been definitely established in this way.

When cancer within the abdomen is suspected, complete X-ray studies are called for, as well as rectal examination, and the use of the proctoscope and perhaps the gastroscope.

It cannot be said too often that vaginal bleeding between periods, or after the menopause, may be a sign of cancer. It calls for an immediate thorough examination, including a biopsy.

THERE are, of course, many other tests for a great variety of conditions, which the doctor may use because of certain symptoms. The foregoing is a brief outline of the ones now available for the commoner conditions that afflict many of us as we grow older. The "complete physical" of today costs more than the one of yesteryear, but it is well worth it.

To go to one of the famous clinics for a thorough check taking a few days to a week would probably cost between $200 and $300. From the family physician, the routine tests described, including blood tests, basal metabolism, liver- and kidney-function tests and necessary X rays, might run anywhere from $50 to $100, depending upon the locality. (Medical charges are higher as a rule in large communities than in small ones, because the physician's overhead is higher.) However, these figures must be weighed against the expenses of the illnesses, operations and hospitalization that may be prevented—costs which often mount astronomically.

There is a final step. Ask your doctor to give you the reports of all the findings of the laboratory and X-ray examinations, after he has finished with them, and keep them. If other studies are needed, or if there is a change of physicians, it may not be necessary for you to take all of them over again. Or comparison with present reports may be a help in diagnosis.

How often should a health audit be made? Every year, if you have reached the middle and later ages, when normal organs often begin to show signs of wear and tear, or if there has been in your family such a disorder as cancer, diabetes, hypertension or tuberculosis.

One prominent gynecologist, alert to the menace of cancer, further suggests a vaginal examination and vaginal smear, plus examination of breasts, every six months when women have passed forty—that period when cancer is more likely to begin.

The younger woman, no matter how perfect her health record, should have a thorough check at every time of crisis in her life: as soon as she becomes pregnant, and after the birth of each child; when domestic burdens seem too heavy to bear; when signs of menopause first appear.

Many a divorce might be avoided if unhappy wives were to seek a doctor instead of a lawyer.

Someday it may be considered a crime against society to let preventable disease reach a point where it disables, and where healthy men and women must use their time and strength to care for the needlessly sick. Today it is a crime against yourself to let symptoms get pronounced before seeking medical aid. The means are at hand for many of us to go actively and happily through the seventies, the eighties, and—who knows?—perhaps even through the nineties.

mother's switch to cushion weave diapers

THESE CUTE TWINS started out wearing ordinary diapers. Then their mother, Mrs. Bela Fhagan of Long Island City, N. Y., tried an experiment. She began using CHIX diapers for just one baby. "I was amazed," she said. "The soft gauze seemed much more comfortable for Cheryl's sensitive skin. The cushion weave absorbed moisture better. And CHIX were so much easier to wash and dry than heavy, bulky cloth. Naturally I soon put my Bonnie in CHIX too. Soft, cushion weave gauze makes the best diapers we've ever used."

Your baby will appreciate these softer diapers. 20 by 40 inch size adjusts as baby grows. At leading stores.

Convalescence can be trying—but it can also be changed into a period of relaxation and enjoyment by the resourceful mother.

A Happy Convalescence for Your Child

By Dr. Herman N. Bundesen

President, Chicago Board of Health

It isn't so bad when the little ones are sick," I have heard many mothers say, "but when they start to get well—watch out!"

All of us hate to see children suffer the pain or discomfort of illness and are naturally delighted when the worst is over and convalescence starts. But it is a fact, as all parents know, that convalescent children are often hard to manage. Days—or even weeks, sometimes—before it is safe to turn the loose at full speed again, they feel all right and are impatient to be up and back at school or at play. The convalescent child cannot understand the reason for restraints imposed on him. To his way of thinking, mother and doctor are simply plotting to hurt his desires.

During convalescence, therefore, bad habits often start. The mother is fearful that the child may have a relapse and so she gives in to his every whim. I recall that when one of my grandchildren had an operation, his mother took him into her bed if he cried, so that she could be sure he was all right. Thus a bad habit was started right in my own home that later on was difficult to break. Unless parents are careful, there can easily be a backsliding into baby ways.

No question about it, convalescence can be trying. And yet, I have seen many a resourceful mother turn it into a period of relaxation and enjoyment, so that the child got needed rest without the usual boredom, impatience and irritations.

How can you make your child's convalescence a positive instead of a negative experience for both of you?

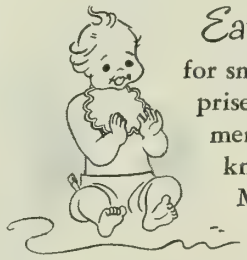
The most important part of the answer to that question, I believe, lies in your own mental attitude. If you approach the care of your sick or convalescent child as a task that has to be performed, or as an excuse for indulgence and breaking all the rules, the chances are that it is going to be burdensome for you and bad for your child. If, instead, you look upon it as an opportunity for growing together—sharing an island of intimacy in the restless, surging sea of life—then you will find many ways to make the hours pass swiftly and profitably for you both.

Let's say that your child is just past the critical point in one of the common illnesses—a mild scarlet fever, perhaps, or measles. Ahead of you is a period of enforced quiet for the youngster before normal activity can be resumed. What plans can you make to prevent the storms that threaten?

The first step is an obvious one, yet it is frequently overlooked. Get in touch with your doctor and find out exactly what the child should and should not be permitted to do.

Many times mothers, in their anxiety to protect the child who has been ill, impose rules that are too strict, keeping the child quieter than he needs to be kept, or for longer periods than are necessary. In fact, doctors today lean more and more toward letting the child do as much as he feels like doing, so long as he does not become overtired.

Even with the most liberal-minded doctor, however, there are going to be some hours in bed. Precisely how these hours are spent will depend mainly on the age and special interests of the individual child. Necessarily, the very small child will need more of his mother's time and attention.



GRATEFUL young mothers from Maine to California tell us that Doctor Bundesen's baby booklets have been of the greatest help to them in caring for their own babies. The first eight booklets cover your baby's first eight months. They sell for 50 cents. The second series of booklets covers the baby's health from nine months to two years—seven booklets for 50 cents. The booklets will be sent monthly; be sure to tell us when you want the first booklet. A complete book on the care of the baby, a necessary supplement to the monthly booklets, OUR BABIES, No. 1345, is 25 cents. A booklet on breast feeding, A DOCTOR'S FIRST DUTY TO THE MOTHER, No. 1346, sells for 6 cents. Address all requests to the Reference Library, LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania.

For the school-age youngster, mother can serve best as an "idea factory," making suggestions and providing materials, but letting the child carry on by himself a great part of the time.

From my own observations of convalescent children during the many years of my experience with mothers and children, and from the fine way that, as health commissioner, I have seen the family doctors handle these cases, I offer these general suggestions as helps toward successful management of the child's convalescence:

1. Let all but the most important of your other duties go during this period. If the sick child's comfort and happiness are your only obligations, you aren't as likely to feel nervous and harassed—feelings which are quickly transmitted to and shared by the child.

2. At the same time, however, wean the child from the constant attendance that may have been necessary when his illness was acute. Let him amuse himself as much as he can, being ready to step in yourself for a time when he becomes bored or tired. Thus will you avoid establishing a babyish dependency on you.

3. Plan a varying program of diversions. For the small child, periods of reading aloud or storytelling will be enjoyed by both of you. In between, the phonograph is an excellent substitute. Most of the old familiar childhood stories are on records today. Buy or borrow a supply. The small child may also have a variety of picture books and dolls, including paper ones, and toy animals, which you will change from time to time to keep him from wearying of them. If he can be propped up in bed, a bed tray or light board placed across his knees will give him a base for all kinds of games.

The nasturtium comes to us from South America, chiefly from Peru and Chile. The original small nasturtium was cultivated because of the high value placed on its seeds, which were pickled when full-grown but yet green. Leaves and flowers also were used in making salads, and the plant was commonly grown in kitchen vegetable gardens.

—FLOWER FACTS AND FANCIES (Society of American Florists).

4. Some children can amuse themselves endlessly by listening to the radio. While I do not share the views of those alarmists who think that radio programs are making all our children neurotic, I do agree that a daylong diet of soap operas and mystery thrillers is not wholesome entertainment for the convalescent youngster. Phonograph records give you control of the content your child hears, and are much to be preferred for younger children.

5. In any neighborhood, a practically inexhaustible supply of children's games, coloring and cutout books, puzzles and other forms of entertainment can be developed if mothers will trade equipment. Start the practice by offering your supply when a neighbor's child is sick. By pooling their resources, a few families together can keep their children happily occupied most of the time.

6. Unless the convalescence is going to last for months, most school and health authorities think it is a mistake to give the child schoolwork to do in bed. Often the pressing sense of school tasks to be done will worry the child and retard his recovery. Teachers say that work done at home under these conditions is rarely satisfactory; the ground must usually be covered again, anyway, when the child gets back to school.

In general, all the activities of the convalescent period should be aimed at producing mental and emotional repose as well as physical rest. Whatever contributes to this end aids recovery, and whatever makes for anxiety or upset of any kind delays the return of health and well-being. THE END

There are 41 new homesteads in the Govern- m nt-owned Black Canyon Dam district. M st of the homesteaders were formerly te ants, or on relief. They moved in from C o, Nebraska, Oregon, nailed up shacks of ta paper and old boards, then started the b kbreaking job of plowing and clearing th sagebrush on the barren dunes, making th m bloom with wheat and corn. They pay n thing for this public land; in three years it s theirs. The first generation usually work th mselves to death, according to the local d tor, pouring their sweat into the hot, p ched sand. With enough courage and lu k and energy, the farms will provide a de- c t livelihood by the time the sons now t dling in the fields are grown men.

The Orchutts moved their tar-papered sh ck from Oregon five years ago, plunked it down on a sand dune in the middle of a h dred acres of sagebrush. Their house and c thes bespeak their struggle for a liveli- hod; but Mrs. Orchutt points proudly to th poppies and willows and irises bordering wat will someday be a lawn, a site where th ir new house will arise. Her children will g to college, and no one looking at the clear, d termined eyes in her sunburned and w thered face can doubt that they will.

The Frys, a Mormon family also living in t newly opened Black Canyon Dam dis- t t, moved onto their land in 1942 with $27 i cash and $34 worth of food stamps. Now t y have 30 head of cows. Their 8 children, i luding a baby of 15 months, overflow a trailer and tiny wooden shack. "One of the boys, I'm not ashamed to admit it," says Mrs. Fry, an energetic, black-haired woman with a look of eagles, "sleeps down in the hoghouse. 'Course there're no pigs down there now and we scrubbed it up good."

Mrs. Fry has 6 children in the Fruitland school, including 18-year-old twins, outstanding in scholarship and 4-H work, who will go to college if the Frys can possibly swing it.

It was Mrs. Fry, in fact, who spark-plugged the idea of a hot school lunch at Fruitland. This consolidated school draws its enrollment of 672 pupils from as far away as 17 miles. Those on the outer radius, such as the homesteaders, walk a half mile or so to catch the school bus at 7:30 A.M., are seldom home before five.

Mrs. Fry stood up at a P.T.A. meeting to protest the apathy of the townsfolk toward a school lunchroom. "My kids rushing to get that bus in the morning don't eat half their breakfast," she said. "And I have to get up an hour earlier to fix their lunches. Just for sandwiches I use a loaf and a half a day. If you count in the cost of the fillings, it would be cheaper if they ate in school and they'd be getting good hot food too."

An excited stir went through the room as other mothers leaned forward eagerly, anxious to hear more. Then a member of the school board spoke. "You folks out there on unimproved land don't pay any taxes; what right have you to tell us how to spend school money? People should take care of their own children."

Looking back on it, the parents of Fruitland now agree that the sense of indignation they felt as Mrs. Fry fumbled for her seat was all they needed to push the lunch program through. After some lively argument, a committee was set up to investigate the possibilities. The position of the school board remained adamant: afraid that it would cause more work for the teachers or dip into school funds, they said they would provide nothing—not electricity for a lunchroom, or janitor service; they refused to put an insurance rider on their policy for a cafeteria; for a while they even refused to provide water and told the parents to dig their own well. The P.T.A., which had been on the point of disbanding through general apathy, suddenly boiled to a white heat.

Since the school had divorced itself from the whole project, it was necessary for the Rosier cheeks, brighter eyes, fewer colds, alert minds are credited to the nourishing hot lunch that Fruitland, Idaho, grade- and high-school children eat daily. The year-and-a-half-old program has been in the black from the start. Daily cost to each child is 22 cents.

A little meat means a lot to baby!

Swift's Diced Meats for Juniors

Chopped—tender and juicy. (Confidentially, the whole family will go for these meats!)

Body-building meat gives baby so much to grow on—complete, high-quality proteins (and baby needs 3 to 4 times more proteins, proportionately, than a grownup)! Meat supplies B vitamins and blood-building iron, too! And babies simply can't resist meat the way Swift prepares it—all soft, smooth and temptingly seasoned with just a touch of salt! It's easy to give your baby the wonderful benefits of meat earlier in life—with Swift's Strained Meats!

Six tempting kinds provide a variety that authorities say helps build sound eating habits. Swift's Strained Meats are all meat—not mixtures—so baby gets to know the individual, distinctive flavors of beef, lamb, pork, veal, liver and heart. These six Swift's Strained Meats acquaint your baby early in life with nourishing meats he will be eating all his life.

ASK YOUR DOCTOR—when and how much Swift's Strained Meats to give your baby. You'll be surprised how much meat a fast-growing baby can eat!

Mother—

read the actual results of feeding tests with Swift's Strained Meats Actual test feedings show babies thrive on Swift's Strained Meats! Feeding tests have established that meat-fed babies are in better physical condition than babies who received no meat. The blood-building iron of meat helps prevent anemia which commonly occurs in infancy.

rents to raise a good bit of money for all e necessary equipment—stoves, sinks, rigerator, and so on. Their original esti-ate was $1500. Since the start of the proj- in October, 1946, over $2100 has been sed, $700 by direct donation. The P.T.A. ve a Community Talent Night, a card rty, and a White Elephant Sale which ought some fantastic proceeds. A cake was ctioned for $10, a loaf of home-baked ead for $2.50. One forgetful lady, in her gerness, bought her own white elephant.

By December, 1946, there was enough oney on hand to start operations. Mrs. bert Groves, a home-economics major at llege, who had been in the habit of driving r young son five miles back and forth from me so he could get a hot lunch at noon, aded the enterprise. On the first Tuesday December, 1946, she found that if they nted Federal assistance their applications ust be filed at the state capitol in two days. hurried trip to the State Department of ucation in Boise, which supervises the hot hool lunch in Idaho, revealed that the U. S. overnment would give them $663 toward o stoves and a sink, and would also pay ne cents a day for every meal served. How-er, no assistance would be available for 47 unless the first meal was served by bruary first, only a few weeks away!

They had planned to convert two unused oms in the basement of the old red brick gade school which were piled high with dis-ded junk, the plastered walls cracked m leaking pipes and black with soot, most the windows broken. At this point discour-ng rumors circulated about town: "A hy basement like that is no place to serve d to children." . . . "There isn't enough ter." . . . "It isn't big enough," and so on.

Uncertain and dismayed, the local com-ittee asked a state sanitation expert to look place over. Appalled at first by what she w, she was soon sketching and planning, nounced the plan feasible. "I never ought they'd be able to make the dead line," she said later, "but they were so hopeful and enthusiastic that I pretended to feel that way too."

From then on, all Fruitland was fused into a frenzy of effort. Housewives rolled up their sleeves, donned slacks and bandannas, inched their way into the cluttered rooms. Methodists and Brethren who had never before spoken, so fierce was the feeling be-tween these two leading sects, introduced themselves on their knees with pails and scrub brushes.

A skilled carpenter volunteered to super-vise the renovating. Before he was finished, he had given three full weeks to the project. Instead of mending their own fences at home, farmers spent the cold winter days ripping out some old shower stalls, uniting the two rooms by cutting arches in the connecting wall, patching plaster and replacing windows. Eighteen picnic-style tables were built with benches attached, big enough to seat 200–250 children at a shift. Table tops of fiber-board were thoroughly varnished and an eighteen-foot serving counter built on one side of the kitchen, with a twenty-foot cup-board and work cabinets across the end.

A calcimining and painting crew of mothers made an unbelievable transformation of the grimy walls with one coat of cold-water paint. Two coats of flat and one coat of white enamel made the woodwork glisten. With an orange enamel accent around the wooden edges of the brown fiberboard table tops and yellow plastic curtains at the windows, the place became cheerful and inviting.

Gradually the project neared completion. Plumbers dodged painters while installing the lavatory, water pipes and a three-com-partment stainless-steel sink. Drainage ditches were ready for pipe installation after persistent workers hacked through frozen ground. All labor was donated. About 150 individuals gave a total of more than 1600 man-hours of labor.

Activity and anxiety increased as the opening day approached and equipment was Fruitland lunch program has been in the black since its inception a year he skill and ingenuity of the cooks, the t sisters, who occupy a special niche affections of the community. About eggs and milk are used for all cookrposes; these are furnished free by the l Government, which also provides surplus foods, such as peanut butter, dried peaches and prunes, canned oes and cheese. A colony of Japanese Fruitland provides free onions for the m each year, and many townsfolk put ra row of carrots in their kitchen gar-for the school lunch. Last year the rs put up 52 gallons of strawberry 92 gallons of apricot jam and 276 cans et potatoes at the community cannery.

ldren, as a rule, are very suspicious of oods; what the Fruitland kids leave on plates is a good indication of what their acks at home. The cooks have given up g spinach, as they won't touch it. They at applesauce, but not the beautiful ious apples native to the area. Stewed nned fruits disappear only if they are ined with gelatin. Raisins are carefully ved from puddings by little fingers and laid on the side of the plate. Lamb is never served (too expensive, say the cooks), but there are adults in Fruitland who have never tasted lamb in their lives, although it is good sheep country—shades of the old bitter feud between cattlemen and the sheep herders!

THE cooks point proudly to their success with raw-carrot sticks, which most of the children had never seen before. The school nurse claims that because of them she can see an improvement in the children's eyesight. One girl's eyes changed from 20–50 to 20–30 in one year, and her headaches vanished. She also believes that the hot lunch was a big factor in cutting down colds and sore throats last winter, and that by raising general body resistance it even helped in diseases like impetigo. A child in the Fruitland school and a child in a school where there was no hot lunch both came down with impetigo at the same time. Although they came from similar homes, there was a week's difference in their absence from school, in favor of the child from Fruitland.

In some cases, school grades improved; but there are too many other variable factors to make a positive statement about this. Without exception, the mothers whose children eat in the lunchroom see a big difference in their vitality. The teachers, who eat the same food as the children, are all enthusiastic. "It does away with that all-in four o'clock feeling," says the third-grade teacher. "If it peps up an adult, it's bound to sustain the energy of a child."

None of the mothers seems to feel that 22 cents a day is too much. "It used to cost me all of that to put up Kenneth'slunch," remarks the wife of a seed rancher. "I used to make him two sandwiches, one with jam and the other with meat. Then he had an orange or banana, some cookies and potato chips. He didn't take anything to drink." Kenneth's grades are up to Excellent this year. He had no bad colds, and missed only two days all year.

It is well that there is no one without a fault, for he would not have a friend in the world. He would seem to belong to a different species.
—WILLIAM HAZLITT.

It is felt that in the course of the next few years, Fruitland can either increase the amount of food it serves or reduce the price. Thanks to excellent management and planning, it is starting this school year with a balance of $1800 in cash. Since the program is still in its infancy, this money is needed for additional equipment such as a lavatory for the help, an electric grinder and mixer, and silverware. (The children donated forks and spoons from home; this year they will be replaced with stainless steel at a cost of $250.) The first year's profits were spent for a root cellar ($750) and two ventilating fans ($200). Of course, all school-lunch programs must be nonprofit in order to receive Federal assistance. When Fruitland acquires all the necessary equipment, then its surplus funds can be spent to benefit the children more directly. In the meantime, it may be necessary, as Mrs. Groves suggests, to raise by a few cents the cost of the lunch for high-schoolers.

The hot lunch in Fruitland has brought other results than rounder, rosier cheeks and brighter eyes. It has brought the fathers' practical good sense into the P.T.A., and it has inspired the start of a similar program in near-by Payette—to the delight of the townsfolk. "We've always been kind of a country cousin to Payette." The school board, which blinked its eyes over the miraculous transformation of their dingy basement, rushed to convert an old gymnasium into three bright new classrooms. The Methodists and Brethren who scrubbed together on their hands and knees are still speaking—a year and a half later. For the first time in Fruitland's history, they now hold joint church services.

The townsfolk and the homesteaders have grown a lot closer too. "Why, the way they're improving their land out there, they'll be paying taxes too," says a farmer's wife happily. "They've got the spunk we need. We're going to fight for a lot of improvements in this town together."

Gracious lines for a traditional room: an early nineteenth-century porcelain oil lamp. The shade is silk shantung, stretched taut, lined in white silk, traced with gilt galloon. Much more than just a source of light, it is really a jewel that the room wears proudly.

Make Light of It

BY H. T. WILLIAMS

TO find the perfect lamps for your rooms, be uninhibited about their start in life. Some of the most beautiful lamps I have ever seen were originally jars, decanters or vases, andirons, even hitching posts. Nine of the lamps shown here began as something completely unrelated to light; two were oil lamps. You can see they've been reincarnated most successfully.

Consider first if the piece to be converted will need a base to give it added decorative quality, weight or height. Wood is used most often—polished, painted, gilded, mirrored, whatever best suits the lamp itself. Decide in advance upon the height of the shade, since this will determine the length of the wiring rod. Naturally, it must be in pleasing proportion to the base, I I feel that too many shades are undersized, causing the lamps to lose mi of their possible style and importance. The wiring will require the service an expert electrician. Many electrical shops are equipped to do all the bori sometimes, however, they will recommend that a cabinetmaker or met worker be consulted. Try to have a photograph or sketch of the effect y want to achieve. Costs of wiring and fixtures are usually fairly reasonal the major expense is likely to be the shade, which a clever woman might ma herself, buying only frame and fabric.

In the spirit of a contemporary room: a sleekly curved lamp base of vibrant pink opaline shaded in white silk of smoothly tailored simplicity.

A dashing scheme will cancel out the old look many dreary apartments have. This one has south-of-the-border colors, new ways with a few old items.

Career Girl Apartment

NOTHING looks less like your dream castle than a dingy third-floor apartment before you start decorating. Happy as you may be to have a place of your own, the chances are the new rooms will be dark, with patched plaster, lumpy paint and dated plumbing. Of course this sad state is the very reason why you can pick up an apartment at your own budget price, but also why you will have such a joyous adventure turning it into the kind of place you like.

Keep in mind four things when planning the job, if you want really successful results and fun while you work. Here they are:

Color is your cheapest and most effective decoration. It is the by-product of all you do and costs nothing in itself. Next, buy second-hand furnishings or shop outside the beaten path, as we did, to find inexpensive, adaptable items that will give personality to your rooms. Then be sure to locate a neighborhood handy man to saw and nail where need be; and, lastly, remember not to overdecorate your living room with amateur crafts such as stencils, fun designs or whimseys. If you like them, save these for your bath and kitchenette.

It's more fun to decorate around a theme, even though you use secondhand furnishings. Gay Pan-American colors gave us both our theme and our scheme, and make the room attractive in an unusual way.

Details . . . The landlord will paint, of course, and therein lies your first triumph. Fresh, new, high-style color will cancel out the old ordinary look, and give you a lift with the rest of your scheme. Think things over carefully, for it is easy to get a wrong start with your backgrounds. Some colors just won't do on imperfect walls, or on any but the most modern, flawless surfaces. This is because colors have varying characters, such as elegance, formality, distinction, gaiety and sophistication. It is best to stay away from the elegancies such as chalk-blue, coral-pink dead white and black. But go as far as you like with dramatic greens, yellows, turquoise or the rich dusty pastels.

The walls of the room in the photograph are painted a strong grayed-chartreuse, appropriately called avocado. It is easy to mix if you put chrome yellow into medium green and add a touch of red. The color is new, has style, and combines well with almost anything. Paint your ceiling the same color as your walls.

The Furniture . . . If you haven't a separate bedroom, buy two studio couches and use them in a corner arrangement. The effect looks built in, and of course the couches serve as seats during the day. For the average person, thirty-inch couches are wide enough for beds and make more comfortable seats than those which are wider.

The newest couches have wooden legs for a modern look, but box couches are good style, also, and have the advantage of storage space inside. You can have your mattresses upholstered in a sturdy fabric such as sailcloth, or make slip covers which can be removed at night.

Any upholstered chair will slip-cover. Of course the job is easier and the effect more professional if the chair has straight lines, so if you have a choice of styles, keep the slip-covering job in mind and choose the chairs with simple lines.

Cushions are almost a necessity if you use your couches for seats. Make soft plump ones, preferably out of feather pillows, and have the colors repeat your scheme.

You will need a desk, and this may be a used one, painted, or simply a commodious table with space for a lamp and writing accessories.

Table styles are changing. Since lamps have grown in scale, tables are larger also. Few of the larger tables now in the market are priced for economy schemes, so you can do one of two things for the new table look. For your coffee table, saw off the legs of an old-style table and paint it exactly to match your furniture. This is not new, of course, but a modern innovation is to buy a woven rush mat for under $2.00, and apply it over the top of your old table, fastening down the edges with a commercial stock molding. The table in the photograph is plywood with straight sawed legs, and the woven top is one of those rush mats common to Mexico and all South American countries.

Try double-decker tables for small rooms or apartments. The one in the photograph is easy to do. You make them out of ordinary tables by adding a superstructure like a shelf on legs. This arrangement gives you a place for books and magazines without crowding the space for your lamp.

Floors . . . Don't think you have to have room-size wool rugs for a studio-type living room. This is the era of innovations in floor coverings, and there are all manner of charming rugs that cost comparatively little and add style to an informal room. Big woven rush rugs such as the one shown in the photograph are extremely durable, easy to care for and cost less than $50.00. They come in many sizes and their natural hue is a soft, neutral grass tone.

If your floor is painted, don't make the mistake of using wood tans and browns. Instead try deep green, rich dark red, midnight blue or off-black. These dark hues set off your other colors to advantage.

Lamps . . . Remember that lamps are huge these days, and most shades have rather straight sides. If you want to keep the cost low, make your lamps out of big jars or colored glass bottles.

The lamps in the photograph are made from inexpensive Mexican glass bottles costing $6.00 with light adapters in the tops and fitted with shades in scale with their height. You can do the whole job yourself. Such bottles are to be found in almost any store these days, and in various colorings. The adapters you buy in an electric shop or a hardware store, and the shades you paint yourself. They are heavy paper which takes either oil or water paint, and may be found in the lamp department of the average store.

Accessory Charm . . . By all means dramatize your love of art, your hobby or your recreation as part of the room's decoration. If you play the piano, include the instrument in your scheme by color-styling it to suit your particular harmony. If you don't want to paint the case, turn it away from the room, cover the back with painted plywood, and use the space for pictures or background as we did in the photograph.

If you collect prints, have them uniformly framed and hang them in groups. If you have a surplus of books, build rows or tiers of shelves and allow the covers to be part of your decorative scheme.

Once settled on a scheme or a theme with unusual colors, you will need to watch carefully to keep out alien hues. You can do this easily if you consider each subsequent addition to the room and make sure it has a rightful place in the picture.

Ten Yards of Boys

By Robert P. Tristram Coffin

Being boys, they sit by kind,
They desert the she-ones there;
Along the window rails they sit
In their spanked-down party hair.

In society they will have Only the onlooker's part,
They sit like Stoics blank of face
With irony in the heart.

They pity their parents and the girls
Making believe the world is good
And singing songs. Their Spartan seats
Press on the hard and splintery wood.

Ten yards of solemn lonely boy,
Aloof from laughter, love and light,
Wise with nine or ten long years.
Ten yards of poems and dynamite!

For in these much too early men
Our glory and our power hide,
And they will soon leap down and split
The world and show the flame inside.

These boys will join the party late,
But they will make it ring and shine,
Once they get over being old
And get their pants off the hard pine!

TITIAN

The rich but subdued coloring of beautiful reddish golden hair such as the Venetian painter Titian spent so much time in portraying in the women he painted has come down to us as an epithet in the term "Titian-haired." A Titian is not strictly a redhead, but rather, as some wit has put it, Titian is the color ascribed to the hair of a poor ordinary redheaded girl as soon as she comes into a large amount of money.

—David T. Armstrong.

ON YOUR GROCERY LIST

If you have a good and ample refrigerator, most of the food for these dinners can be purchased on Saturday or whatever your main shopping day may be. Milk and cream, of course, you will buy as needed; and if your family is large, you will have to buy bread or rolls several times a week. Ice cream may be bought Saturday and stored in the freezing tray of the refrigerator. All meats, vegetables and fruits may be purchased at one time, with the exception of additional salad greens and fresh fruit for salad (unless you used canned) along about Wednesday. Friday's main dish is particularly planned to be made up of canned foods, so that you won't have to stop at the store on Friday when your regular marketing day is to be Saturday.

Following is a check list of the special things you will need to prepare these dinners—just to remind you when you shop. Food for Saturday's dinner is not included. Since this meal does not involve advance planning, you can add the items to your list according to what you think the family might like and what is particularly easy to prepare.

A broiler meal and fresh fruit might be the best choice, as this is a busy day.

Meats, eggs and cheese. Smoked ham, ground beef or a combination of ground beef, pork and veal for meat loaf, cheese and eggs.

Fresh Fruits. Fresh pears, red plums, other fresh fruit such as large slicing oranges and grapefruit that will keep for Thursday's salad, apples—enough for a pie and applesauce for two meals—and an avocado (buy an unripe one—on the hard side; it will be just right to eat by Wednesday).

Fresh vegetables. Green beans (enough for two meals), spinach, potatoes and sweet potatoes (enough for two meals each), tomatoes, cucumber, corn on the cob (enough for two meals), beets, green peppers, onions and salad greens. These will need to be replaced once during the week unless you have ample space and the type of refrigerator that keeps leafy vegetables fresh.

Groceries. Biscuit mix, pastry mix, shortening, butter or margarine, tomato juice, unflavored gelatin, packaged butterscotch or chocolate-pudding dessert, nuts, rice, tomato sauce or tomato paste, split peas, canned peas, canned spinach (unless you bought fresh or frozen), canned tuna fish, canned fruit, canned macaroni and cheese, canned condensed mushroom soup, French dressing or ingredients for making your own, flour, sugar, coffee, and so on.

lices that save people's time, energy and, he long run, money. Especially during everybody's-busy period in a family's a good vacuum cleaner, a washing ma- e, an efficient iron or electric ironer, to e just a few, will seem like the good ds they really are. To the Melsons, pres- saucepans (they have three and keep n all pretty busy) are a great help, for times are uncertain, and no one has h time to spend preparing food on kday nights.

Keep in touch. Set up an information rd for posting messages, notes, direc- s from mother, reminders of who's to do t. In a family whose members come and ike trains in the Grand Central Station, elps to keep track of everyone this way.

Change the pace. Review your family plan often, encourage new ideas and new skills. Boredom and monotony, vacations, weather and accidents must be considered. The best of plans, like the best of minds, are flexible though firm. Everyone starts off on such a project as "let's all work" with enthusiasm; it takes real character on someone's part (probably mother's) to keep everyone up to the pitch he's promised. Change of pace helps, if it's only changing from official bedmaker to official vegetable preparer for a while. Even a carrot can be a challenge!

Last but certainly not least, as a smoother-outer, never forget the old maxim, "A place for everything and everything in its place." It's trite only because it's so maddeningly true that it bears repeating often! THE END

Yet Annie has known for years that she would have to make a break from the life pattern her father had laid down for her, because it was not the right one for her. Heretofore, however, she had avoided a head-on collision.

"Deciding to marry Willie is the first thing I have ever done in my life without consulting my parents—and to carry it through against their wishes was the hardest thing I have ever done in my life. I realized that if I did marry Willie, I must be willing to put my husband's career ahead of everything else—it is such a tremendous thing, you see, so precious. I faced the question of my own feelings—did I love Willie enough to marry him, apart from our common absorption in music and the glamour of his place in music? If music and career were taken away, would he still be what I wanted? When I knew beyond doubt he was the only man I could ever love, I told him I would marry him."

I have sense enough, but it always comes too late.
—MARIE BASHKIRTSEFF.

The fact that Kapell belongs to a group often discriminated against did not disturb Annie at all. She lifted her chin proudly when this was mentioned.

"Suppose there are hotels at which we won't be able to stay? I wouldn't go to such places anyway. Discriminations against any group are wrong, and the only way to do away with them is to do something about them. Willie and I both want a family—four children, at least—and we want to start right away. Discrimination will never be solved as long as we yield to it."

Why had they married so suddenly, and without letting her parents know?

"It wasn't selfishness, really, as I know they will think. In fact, I was trying to be unselfish. My father had said he didn't see how they would have time to give me a wedding—mother is going to summer school, you know, after her teaching term ends. Mother had said flatly that she wouldn't come East if we were married at Willie's home. So there we were. But the principal reason why we did [so] suddenly was that Willie wasn't get[ting] practicing done!"

She added, gesturing widely with h[er] ful musician's hands: "Father and [Mother] will always be a part of me, the bigg[est] of me. If I can only make them unde[rstand]

So all the threads of the Melson [story] surely a most loving one—are gath[ered] gether, and we see that the devot[ion] care and training Ray and Nellie [Melson] have bestowed on their daughters h[ave] duced three lovely, talented, pu[re] young women, intellectually alive, [so]conscious. In spite of the fact that ea[ch] rebelling, or has rebelled, against th[e] strings, each has found or will find [her] best suited to her individuality and [talent]. Thus Ray and Nellie Melson have [accom]plished the end pu[rpose] the rearing of their[daugh]ters, even though t[he] sition to full adulth[ood] been attended by [storms] and thunderstorm[s].

I believe that intelligent, devoted [Ray] Nellie Melson will have the wisdom [to] this further step.

Even in Portland, unaware as y[et] Annie's marriage was a fait accompli [for] Ray Melson groping through the ties [and] dition by which he is bound.

"Maybe I have tried to hold on [to] daughters too closely," he said.

Nellie Melson leaned forward. "Wh[at] need are some new interests, father," s[he] like finance, industry and business generally, and in this case it seems to have gone farther than in any previous decision toward nationalizing our system of public education. One of the Justices himself expressed the fear that through zeal for its own opinions the Court had now "constituted itself a super board of education for every school district in the nation." He reminded his colleagues that "there are 256 separate religious bodies in the United States and that each of them has as good a right as this plaintiff to demand that the courts compel the schools to sift out of their teaching everything inconsistent with its doctrines."

SHOULD RELIGION BE TAUGHT IN OUR SCHOOLS?

That such fears were justified is evident from the large number of suits which have already been filed against local boards and the reluctance of such boards to take action on matters formerly clearly within their province.

Before we can discuss how far-reaching the effects of the decision may be on various phases of American education, we must consider just what it has declared illegal. Its language seems almost combative and is as downright as a box on the ear. It reaffirms, "No tax in any amount, large or small, can be levied to support any religious activities or institutions, whatever they may be called, or whatever form they may adopt to teach or practice religion." It specifically condemns "the use of tax-supported property for religious instruction." This would seem to affect higher education as well. A recent survey showed that 80 per cent of our state universities and colleges have instituted departments of religion or are offering courses specifically designed to "teach religion." Anyone who has visited the campuses of tax-supported colleges can testify that or[ganized] of them nothing in recent years has s[eriously] ously depressed faculty morale as the C[ourt's] decision. Some of these institutions [have] been threatened with the withdrawal [of] propriations and many of them must b[e] pared to defend themselves against sui[ts]. a curious irony their teachers feel th[at] academic freedom to teach religion, [in] their states have wisely accorded th[em] now being placed in jeopardy by the Court to which they once looked for p[ro]tion.

Let us now consider our central pro[blem]: the place, if any, which religion shou[ld] cupy in education. To free our minds [of] legalistic preoccupations, let us assume education has an aim of its own and even tax-supported schools and colleges not in order to exemplify a rule of law b[ut] give every young citizen the soundest p[re]ration for life consistent with the publi[c] fare. When on this basis we ask wha[t] effects of eliminating religion might be, one of the concurring Justices can help u[s] tells us that if we cast out of public e[du]tion all that some people may reasonab[ly] gard as religious instruction, we tak[e] heart out of teaching in many fields. [The] fact is that "for good or ill, nearly every in our culture worth transmitting, e[very] thing which gives meaning to life is satu[rated] with religious influences. One can h[ardly] respect," he concludes, "a system of e[du]tion that would leave the student ign[orant] of the currents of religious thought that [move] the world society, for a part in which [he] being prepared."

We all recognize the role which the study of the arts, music, painting, architecture, literature has come to play in the study and understanding of civilizations. We know that works of art survive the collapse of empires, that the coin outlasts Tiberius. We also know that religion, more than any other single influence, has determined the nature, subject and spirit of the greatest works of art and literature. The student cannot understand Gothic architecture or Italian painting or the music of Bach, the poems of Homer, Vergil, Dante, Milton or even of T. S. Eliot, or the novels of Melville or Hawthorne, unless he understands the religious conception on which they are based. Novalis has said that philosophy bakes us no bread but gives us God, freedom and immortality. The same might be said of religion.

Some may feel this is not a serious matter and that the arts may be dismissed as luxury subjects, but religion not only underlies and informs works of art. In wide areas it underlies and informs our language as well. To respect Vashti McCollum's wishes, for instance, we would have to exclude not only expressions like "God" and "Holy Writ," but a host of other words like the little word "sin." It has no place in the atheist's vocabulary, but will probably be used for some time to come. Any effective attempt by a teacher to explain it, or to distinguish sin from crime, will force her in some degree at least to resort to religious education.

An educational diet which omits all religion rapidly becomes what the Italians call a saltless pumpkin. It not only lacks savor, it also lacks significance. You can no more teach any cultural subject without teaching religion than you can teach family relations without discussing sex.

Quarrels and the sea are best viewed from afar.

In religious matters we have had much fanaticism of the right—the fanaticism of orthodox sectarians. Atheism is also a form of fanaticism—the fanaticism of the left. To Mrs. McCollum the only true religion is irreligion. She has a right to be protected in her private beliefs. She has no right to ask that a system of public education eliminate everything not in accordance with her private convictions. It is one of the virtues of democracy that it allows each of us to live in his own private universe. It was by apparently entertaining Mrs. McCollum's complaints that the Court plunged us all into confusion. It does not help to have our Justices tell us that in excluding the teaching of religion from our schools and colleges they are not "indifferent" to the interests of religion. To some this is only a quibble. It is like saying after you have deprived a man of one of his most valuable tools, or most valuable assets, that you are not indifferent to property rights.

When we introduce any subject of study into the schools, we give it significance and status. When we introduce civics or cooking or American history or dressmaking, it is our way of telling pupils these subjects are important in their preparation for life. When we omit only one subject, religion, we help to confirm that schoolboy definition of religion, as "believing what you know ain't so." It does not advance matters very much to say that religion can best be taught in the home. At a time when we have come to teach every other conceivable subject, including home economics, in the schools, this is not honest. It is only stultifying. We must face the fact that a policy which today would exclude religion from its system of education is not neutral, it is unfavorable to religion.

We must now turn briefly to what may be an important aspect of the problem of teaching religion: its relation to political systems. Some of us may offhand be inclined to accept the schoolboy's definition mentioned above. For that reason let us have before us a simple and more generally accepted definition, that given by Webster's New International Dictionary. Religion is "An apprehension, awareness, or conviction of the existence of a supreme being, or more widely, of supernatural forces or influences controlling one's humanity's, or nature's destiny."

We shall see that religion therefore not underlies and informs the art, the liter and the language of our tradition, it u lies and informs our great political docur and conceptions as well. By Webster's d tion, the Declaration of Independence religious document. It justifies the foun of our Government in an appeal to "the of nature's God." We have a right to d our inalienable rights because all men endowed with them by their Creator.

The greatest threat to our civilizatio the twentieth century has lain, and still in what the Germans call the Revolt ag the West. So far, this revolt has taken forms. In both of them, Nazism and Rus Communism, one political party elimin all other parties and took control of ed tion. Both promptly eliminated religion the schools. The Nazis derived their ra not from religion but from biology, from mones and chromosomes. The official Primer used for the instruction of H Youth tells us that conceptions like "hun ity, liberty, equality, fraternity are ca words of religious origin." It warns yo Nazis against them and tells them in s that "Christians reject the race idea with citation, 'Before God all men are equa Russian totalitarianism follows the same religious line. The treatise on Pedagogy in Soviet teacher training is also scornf "the Commandments of God": "We re any such morality which is derived from ex human (religious) con tions. It is a fraud . designed to dull minds of workers peasants. . . . Commu ethics is devoted to purpose of creatin communist society," "with this struggle must be linked ev step in the education of youth." Too m of us are unwilling to admit that ther any virtue in Soviet ethics. It must be ognized, however, that it does accept on same terms members of any race who are ing to join the communist fold. Soviet et begins (and ends) with adherence to a par ular political regime. The citizen who dep from the party line loses all claim to con eration and may be ruthlessly purged. ethics, our faith in human rights and fr doms, precede and transcend all polit considerations. The success of our democr can best be measured by the degree to wh it respects those freedoms. Its weaknesses not lie in the source of its principles, but our failure to live up to them.

Whenever any church, any establishm of religion, attempts to dominate our syst of public education, it becomes a threat freedom of religion and is subversive of democracy. That was happening in Virgi in 1785, where Church of England paris dominated and had been an establis church. That church sought to have the tax levied on all citizens, used to support its o schools. It was not because we were hostile religion, but because we feared the domina of one sect, that we developed the policy separation of church and state. When a s tem of education is controlled by any church or any one political party, we ha taken the first long step toward what we u to call absolutism, and in its newer forms call totalitarianism. Eternal vigilance is he and always will be, the price of liberty.

Madame Roland, on her way to the guil tine, exclaimed, "O Liberty! What crim have been committed in thy name!" T same, also, must be said of religion. That d not mean that we should abolish either l erty or religion from life or education. It mea only that they have been among the m powerful forces which have made the tra history of mankind what it is. We do not ha to believe with Toynbee that the rise of re gion is the central phenomenon in the histo of civilization; but when we eliminate re gion from education we do help to render h tory, particularly American history, mea ingless.

The attitude of totalitarian states, which eliminate religion because they find our conceptions of civil liberties and democracy anchored in it, suggests that the Court may be moving too fast and in the wrong direction. There is a poem of Goethe's about a sorcerer's apprentice who possessed magic enough to open floodgates, but not enough to close them. The Court is in this position.

Many teachers and citizens interested in education are asking, "Where does this leave us?" The Court's decision has raised many questions, but so far has settled only one. Champaign's released-time system is illegal. Other systems similar to Champaign's are illegal by implication. Four of the concurring justices were troubled by the character of the decision and indicated that their vote applied only to the Champaign plan. Communities with differing released-time programs may legally continue until, if and when sued, they have had their day in the U. S. Supreme Court.

In higher education, some state universities have taught courses in religion since their foundation. Graduate departments of religion have been training teachers whose competence is now on a par with that of scholars in other fields of study. The work of departments and schools of religion has been steadily extended with much profit to the work in other departments. In the recent per has been a marked trend in co strengthen what the Harvard Rep "General Education," and on many courses in religion have made a wide nized contribution. The Court's de that no tax-supported property can to teach religion has encouraged threaten suits, and some will cert tried. As yet, however, no colleg need be discontinued for legal reason is a very general hope that the Court when such suits are decided, seriousl state institutions and place them severe handicap as compared with in ent colleges.

One service the McCollum case dered. It has called attention in startli ion to what is perhaps the most im single question which we now face in education. All interested groups of particularly of teachers, are called up study and reassess the results of pr that have now been in operation fo years. The least, and perhaps the mo they can do is to make their convictio above all, their findings known. In a m such importance to the training of ou citizens, we can be confident that our will not be indifferent to reasoned publ ion and what the majority of Americ gard as sound public policy. TH

The Magazine Women Believe In, Quite Rightly

PEARL S. BUCK

"My novel Kinfolk rose out of my deep interest in and continuing experience with the variety of China's people today. This variety is not to be found in different races and religions, as it is in the United States. Yet the variety is infinite; it comes from the breaking up of old patterns of life. Long isolated and secure in their own ways, the Chinese lived serene and confident lives. Now these old ways are changing and it is in this change that I found my material for Kinfolk." (First of five parts, page 34.)

ADELE S. OSHERSON

"I married at the end of my sophomore year at Smith and was graduated the following spring, thus winning innumerable family wagers. The next three years I spent traveling as an Army Air Corps wife. While stationed near Memphis our son, David Samuel, was born. Being modern parents, we are not allowed to brag how wonderful he is. My husband is happy about the publication of Wait for Me Darling (page 74). He says he will now buy a new typewriter and a whip, and retire."

PHYLLIS BOTTOME

This English novelist (Mrs. A. E. Forbes Dennis) is the author of many books, best known of which are Private Worlds, The Mortal Storm, and Survival. She has expressed her literary creed in these words: "If a writer is true to his characters they will give him his plot. The mind of the artist should shine out at us, without the blur of personal proclivities." This rule has helped to produce good fiction. To see how she has followed her creed in telling the story of her life, turn to Search for a Soul, page 36.

A Good Man's Hard to Find

Chicago, Illinois.

Dear Editor: How does a young woman in her early twenties go about meeting new young men? How does a young woman get to meet new people?

Eight hours a day, five days a week, I work in a fabulous advertising agency in Chicago. The only men I meet are the staff members whom I see every day of the year—and who are married. They are the men who ask the young ladies out for an innocent drink or dinner or etc.

But what if you don't want to play along? Then how do you meet new men, new people? For three years I've been going to evening school: for one reason, to finish up and get a degree; the second—to meet new people, have some social life.

So far I haven't. The nice men I've met are all married and through them I've formed wonderful friendships with their families.

My girl friends are all married. They married after the war and now have their husbands and children to worry about rather than fixing a spare girl up with a young man. The girls in our office have the same problem. They can't be bothered fixing another girl with a friend of theirs. Too much competition these days.

Then what do you do? Take to bars, where the men are certainly not the kind to bring home to mother? Go to dances stag and hope fearfully someone will ask you for one dance? Beg your friends to introduce you to their husbands' second cousin?

What do we do? It's all very easy to say join some clubs, do some entertaining, try to meet new people—if you know how!

Sincerely,
RUTH L. RATNY.

A Woman Needs a Man

New York City.

Dear Editor: I'm really getting sick of the way we bleat about women's hard-fought-for achievement of "independence." Along with it has come defeat too. This attitude about asserting your independence and getting a job instead of a husband is responsible for a great deal of the unhappiness today. Women don't dare admit they want a man and home and children. It's not smart. It's not using their hard-earned "independence."

Yours truly,
(Name withheld by request.)

Dear Editors: Isn't it about time you gave us a present? Please, we want two or three pages of full-color spread repeating in miniature your series of mother-daughter covers! We don't care whether the little girl has or hasn't grown up in just the right series of spurts. They have told a lovely story of love and companionship and family life that is really a bit of Americana.

Americans in Germany

With the American Occupation Forces, Germany.

Dear Editors: So very many people have the idea that all we do is play over here, that we live the "life of Riley" so to speak, that the Government offers us free servants, free homes, free boat trips. Well, in part some of this is true, but I would like the rest of the United States to know the score.

There are so many things I should like to tell you: about our lovely big house; our two servants and the difficulties I had with the language barrier at first (some of the things that came out of my kitchen that first month, oh my!); my draperies made out of nylon parachutes; my boar-hunting trips; the clothes I design or make from patterns for myself and the girls.

We have three children. Michaele Janet is 6, ready for school this fall, platinum-haired, very active and is just learning to play the piano. Kris Tina is 4, red-haired, a little minx. Then there is David III, who is 20 months, a perfect cross between a redhead and a platinum blond (and it would be curly!). He also is a minx, has learned to walk and talk in Germany. As a matter of fact, all the children speak and understand German better than we do. The other members of our family are: Arko, a Boxer who is lazy, homely, but definitely good for the children; August and Theressa, our houseman and house frau who are man and wife and to whom we are devoted.

As far as I am concerned, this is the first time since I have had little folks running around that I have had any time to myself. I am taking piano lessons again; learning how to shoot an Army carbine; starting German lessons in the fall; enjoying my husband, for I am able to go with him on his hunting and fishing trips, and we do as much sight-seeing as possible (we are planning a trip to Italy in the fall). I feel that this is an opportunity of a lifetime for me, something that I probably never would have been able to do otherwise. (One thing I dearly love and that is not having to do the dishes after dinner!)

On the other hand, there are many things that are difficult over here too. Our houses are furnished for us, true, but our rental allowance ($105 a month for us) comes out of our pay; the Government furnishes us with 1½ servants, but we feed them. So instead of feeding 5 I now am feeding 7 plus 1 meal a day for 5 days for my wash frau. My commissary bill was running between $160 to $170 a month before my husband left on maneuvers—quite a jump from what it was at home. Besides that, we keep our servants in shoes, clothing, razor blades, cream and some of the little things that make life more pleasant and which they have not been able to buy. Most of my Army friends have difficulty saving money because of the high expense of living over here.

One thing that most of us mothers worry about is disease. Skin diseases are especially bad in Germany.

Automobiles go to pieces easily because of the bad roads. Cobblestone streets are hardy but make even new cars rattle after a short time. We are in constant fear of being robbed.

It takes a heap of understanding, too, to live with these Germans. After all, we are the Americans who are setting the example of what Germans think Americans should be. Sometimes that is rather hard to do.

Sincerely yours,
MRS. DAVID M. KYLE.

Marriage Like Making a Pie

Roxbayton, Connecticut.

Dear Editors: After reading Making Marriage Work, by Clifford R. Adams, I tried to answer for myself "what I sought in marriage."

I found that I couldn't answer this question. Although Doctor Adams listed the ingredients for a happy marriage, no one can separate those ingredients or decide which is the most important, any more than anyone can decide, in making a good apple pie, whether the apples, the spices, the sugar or the piecrust is the most important ingredient. They are all important and inseparable, as are ingredients of a happy marriage. Sincerely,

Journal Saves Her Money

Hornell, New York.

Dear Editors: I used to read all the women's magazines, until I found that I never had time to read a book. I seemed to be living on caviar and cookies, while I needed some bread and butter. So, for a while, I cut them all out. But then I found that I needed to read a woman's magazine in order to keep in touch with things. Then, too, I had bought a sewing machine and had started making almost all my own and my daughter's clothes. So, I went back to the JOURNAL.

I often use Ann Batchelder recipes and menus—she could come cook for me any time. Her stuff is so practical—not all fancy teatime or card-party dainties as in some of the magazines. And she doesn't require you to use outlandish ingredients that can't be had in a small-city grocery store. Conversation Piece gives you ideas for the fancier party dishes.

Yours truly,
MRS. O. A. CAREY.

Of Illness—and Essentials

The Duke's Cottage, Rudgwick, England.

My dear Bruce and Beatrice: I just went through one of the patches of shadow that come to us all at times and have to be got through somehow or other. I was far from home, called in haste to help nurse someone with a bad kind of appendicitis. For the first time for many a year I again became acquainted with the breaking dawn, the little night noises of a strange garden, and the morning star. All life narrowed down, meantime, to the simple business of getting through another night. We didn't have enough pajamas for the patient, and there were no more coupons, though the shops seemed to be full of the garments. So endless washings had to be done, but there was a chronic shortage of soap. The patient needed fruit, but there weren't no fruit, except the sort the patient couldn't have. And we were on a hilltop, a very long way from shops of any kind, without very much petrol.

I have never had much to do with adult illness—and have always been one of those heartless people, apt to hand what my children called The Vombowl to the sufferer and tell them to get on with it. So—late in life—this came to teach me a good lesson—and to confirm a suspicion I have always had: that the burden one bilks is never cast off, but will be waiting farther down the road, very much increased and augmented, a little later on.

Life becomes immensely simple at times like these—and small things of vast importance. The wonderful gladness when the first bird sings and one thinks, "Well! Here we still are!" Or the sun coming out suddenly on the hills, and there seems to be no tomorrow and no yesterday—only one quavering hope that a time will come when we can look back on all this, saying, "Do you remember that hateful time?"

Later. How I have enjoyed the accounts of your child's wonderful wedding. I would love to marry off one daughter with pomp and ceremony, and all the benefits of flowers and bridesmaids. I was married at three days' notice, with Zeppelins wiffling overhead and the Channel full of submarines. I had to marry daughter Mary off in much the same utilitarian fashion, with a Court

The Indians taught maple-sugar making to the French settlers who, in return, furnished metal kettles to replace crude Indian utensils.

Hankering for real maple sugar flavor

The Indians probably were the first to discover that delicious syrup could be made from the sap of the maple tree. But their crude methods could not produce the flavor you get in Vermont Maid Syrup.

Our skilled blenders select maple sap that's rich and full-bodied; then blend it with cane sugar. This blend gives you, at moderate cost, real maple sugar flavor that is uniformly rich and delicious. At your grocer's.

Tennis tournament—and I won! And the judge kissed my hand. (Was I thankful my hands felt smooth—glad I use Jergens Lotion!) Bob was watching and later...

Strolling near the Casino—"Must be nice, that hand-kissing," Bob said, "...when a girl's hands are soft as yours." I shivered with joy. And that night...

On the balcony—Bob kissed both my hands. "So lovely," he said. "I want your soft hands for mine—all my life."

So my hands must be always soft. I know they can be—I'll always use Jergens.

Now your hands, too, can feel even softer and smoother with Jergens Lotion care. Today's Jergens Lotion is finer than ever, as a result of up-to-date research. Protects even longer, too.

Not that it made any real difference, but I certainly would love to marry one daughter off really de luxe, with new luggage and six of everything, and a proper outfit of linen with monograms on it, and a canteen of good plate!

Shortest Story?

At a recent party in New York, William March, favorite author of the "butcher paper" literary critics, contended that he had authored the "shortest short story ever written." ED.

UNTITLED STORY—
By William March

Here is the history of the credulous widow who met an admiring stranger in a cocktail lounge, and who, after turning her liquid assets over to him, was never seen again by her friends:

On Monday she was in his thoughts.
On Tuesday she was in his automobile.
On Wednesday she was in his hotel room.
On Thursday she was in his arms.
On Friday she was in his big wardrobe trunk, checked through to Los Angeles.

Friendly Complaint

Lemont, Illinois.

My dear Journalists: My only complaint with the JOURNAL is that it is too unwieldy to hold when nursing a baby. I keep banging him on the head when I turn the pages.

Seriously, the secret of your success for me is that you are all so friendly. You open your doors and invite us to come in.

Sincerely,
HELEN SHARPLESS.

Mutual Faults—and Marriage

Houma, Louisiana.

Dear Editor: My husband and I have been married two years, we have a one-year-old son, and we're happy. My husband's the only man I know who can say "You're spending too much money" without even hurting your feelings.

Sincerely,
MRS. V. MICHEL.

But do you spend less money? ED.

Wisest Way to Build?

Terre Haute, Indiana.

Dear Mr. and Mrs. Gould: After reading Housewife Builds a House in the July JOURNAL, I wondered why the JOURNAL would print such an article. I know little of building conditions or contractors in Canada, but as a contractor's wife, I am stating conditions that exist in the United States.

The lady from Canada stated her house was built in 5½ months ("a far shorter time than a contractor would take"). But here are some facts from one who knows:

My husband built in four months' time a six-room house, size 35′ x 46′2″, with two bathrooms, all the latest improvements, automatic oil heating system, well insulated and air conditioned. In three months he completed a six-room, all modern house with kitchen planned from the JOURNAL.

Next, the lady said she did nothing but get materials when the men needed them. A contractor figures out lists of materials well ahead, and places orders far enough in advance to have materials on the job always. Idle men waiting for someone to go get materials cost money.

The lady from Canada then stated: "We saved $5000 by building without a contractor." A small contractor, when not too busy, works along with his men, thereby saving the cost of another carpenter. With larger contractors, very few charge much for supervision. With the highest priced contractors, ones who charge 10 per cent for supervision, the lady from Canada would have had to build a home costing at least $50,000 to save $5000. From her story and the picture of her home, I judge her house to have cost less than $9000.

So where and how did she save $5000 by building without a contractor?

Sincerely yours,
MRS. JOSEPH L. WARNER.

THE CUTER THEY ARE THE HARDER THEY FALL

By Sonia Lee

AS THE TOWERS of Manhattan gleamed in the morning sun, Clara's hopeful young heart pounded with eagerness and expectation. "What a beautiful city!" she thought. "My city to be!"

There would be so many fascinating places to see . . . so many famous people to meet . . . such an interesting job in one of the big studios. And, of course, a wonderful man whom she would some day meet and marry.

The vast catacombs of brick and mortar held no terror for her whatsoever. With her courage, her ability, her looks, how could she fail? As the train shot into the tunnel she took a last look at the tall buildings, now warming under the rising sun.

"It's my oyster, my great, big, beautiful oyster! And I'm the one to open it."

At first, things seemed to go beautifully. She did meet a few famous people . . . but they didn't see her a second time. She did land a good job . . . but somehow it didn't last. And she did meet the dream man . . . but he didn't last, either.

Poor little, cute little Clara! She had every charm but one*. But without that one charm it is pretty hard for anyone to get by for very long. The cuter they are the harder they fall.

In romance as in business, halitosis* (unpleasant breath), whether chronic or occasional, can be three strikes against you. The insidious thing is that you, yourself, may not realize when you're guilty. But why risk offending even occasionally?

ILLUSTRATED BY JACK KEAY

Why put yourself in a bad light even once when Listerine Antiseptic is such a simple, delightful extra careful precaution against bad breath? You merely rinse the mouth with Listerine Antiseptic, and instantly your breath becomes sweeter, fresher, less likely to offend. Never, never omit this extra careful precaution before any appointment where you want to be at your best.

While some cases of halitosis are of systemic origin, most cases, say some authorities, are due to the bacterial fermentation of tiny food particles clinging to mouth surfaces. Listerine Antiseptic halts such fermentation, then overcomes the odors fermentation causes.

LOOK INTO YOUR MIRROR

EVERY year we hear of a Community Chest Fund "drive" to get us to "give" as much as we can "afford" for various "charitable causes" in our community. It may be better to give than to receive; but frankly, we sometimes feel it is no fun at all. We could get just as many laughs out of paying our debts or insurance premiums, and a good many more by spending the money for pleasure. We can't believe much in the sweetness of giving when the donation is impersonal and we never see the recipient. Especially that word "drive" we don't like.

Perhaps it would be better to think of payments to the Community Chest Fund as "citizenship assessments" or just plain debt or as payment for insurance or for pleasure. For it is all those things. The Red Feather Community Chest Fund supports many services in our community we wouldn't want to be without. The assessment is really many assessments in one and permits installment payment on our debts (Traveler's Aid, Community Centers, Day Nurseries, Clinics), our insurance (Homes for the Aged, Neighborhood Houses, Salvation Army) and our pleasures (Boy and Girl Scouts, Summer Camps, the USO and many others). These all seem to be good and necessary things, and no one has thought of a better way of financing them than through the consolidated Red Feather Community Chest Fund.

Maybe it is just as well the amount of our payment is optional, for we would be pressed to pay the debts we actually owe to one or another of these services. Undemanding generosity is an American tradition, and it's a good thing, although when we give anything to anybody we like to see his eyes light up. Probably we never shall see ourselves as others see us, and that's a good thing, too, but when our Community Chest assessment falls due we're going to look into a mirror.

Give . . . and give enough!

"I Never Became Acquainted With American Government"

By Dorothy Thompson

IN a recent congressional hearing on communist espionage activities in the United States, a star witness was Miss Elizabeth T. Bentley, a former member of the Communist Party, and, according to her own statement, a wartime courier for a communist spy ring. Miss Bentley, in her testimony, made candid confessions on her own account. She detailed the opinions she had once held, and which she now regards as illusions, described herself as a "confused liberal," and testified that she had been drawn toward communism because she "wanted to do something about conditions in this country which do exist and cannot be denied."

Then she made a statement which leaped out of the newspaper—to the eye of this reader, at least:

"I grew up to womanhood without becoming acquainted with the American government. . . . This fault, I think, runs all through our educational system."

If this statement is true, it is not because Miss Bentley was not "educated." She went through grammar school and high school, graduated in 1930 from a very highly rated woman's college in the East, and took a master's degree at Columbia University. She took a liberal arts course, majoring in English which she later taught, along with French and Italian. She must have had, all along the line, courses in history, including American history. She certainly knew how our government functions, or she would have been of no use to the communists in a confidential position.

What, then, did she mean by the statement that she had "grown to womanhood without becoming acquainted with the American government"? Obviously she must have meant that at no point in her education did she receive illumination of the American political philosophy enabling her to understand and appreciate the basic assumptions underlying our government and society; she had never, therefore, either clearly accepted or clearly rejected those assumptions. Hence she was unable to discriminate between what is compatible with loyal American citizenship and what incompatible. She did not reject American democracy as, for instance, a well-trained Marxian theorist rejects it; she abandoned it without even knowing that she was doing so.

And I am afraid that she was correct in saying that our education, even our higher education, is deficient in teaching our young people the fundamental philosophy of our government. Some years ago a friend, born and educated in Europe, was teaching political philosophy in a summer course at a graduate school, conducted largely for teachers. A poll of these graduate students, most of whom were teaching English, history, sociology or economics, revealed that hardly one of them had ever read the Federalist Papers. Yet in these papers, more than in any other single document, is set forth the political philosophy underlying the Constitution.

The basic concern of the founding fathers, as all know who have followed their reasoning processes, was the concern of all the great political thinkers from Socrates and Aristotle to Bertrand Russell; namely, the problem of power. There can be, as they saw, no freedom without government, since there is no freedom for anyone in the jungle of anarchy. But since government, at its minimum, includes the power to legislate, to judge, to tax and to punish, it represents the single greatest power in society and is in possession of the instruments whereby it can extend its own power into a totality. Even the device of majority rule is no safeguard against such aggrandizement: 51 per cent of the population could, theoretically, exercise a tyranny over the other 49 per cent as oppressive as that of 1 per cent.

The framers of the American republic were above all concerned to create a system which would prevent the repetition of unhappy historical precedents—the degeneration of a society of free men into a tyranny, exercised either by an oligarchy of the privileged against the masses, or by a tyranny exercised by a faction leading the underprivileged against the rest, both varieties of tyranny having many historical examples. They therefore sought to close all accesses to government power over the thoughts of men (free speech, press, assembly); to place definite legal restraints upon government control over men's bodies (habeas corpus, trial by jury, prohibition of "cruel and unusual punishments"); to divide the functions of government between legislative, judicial and executive bodies, and between Federal, state and municipal authorities, so as to create checks and balances to power, and to retain for the individual and society, outside of government, the largest possible amount of autonomy.

The political thinkers who devised American democracy never for an instant conceived of the state (the Government) and the people as being coexistent and identical. The people and their society pre-existed. The state was an institution to which powers were delegated by consent.

These delegations of powers were necessary for any peaceful order of liberty under law. But their possession constituted a temptation and a danger which the eighteenth-century political philosophers clearly recognized. They were highly realistic men. Although their purpose was to create a human society offering hitherto unknown freedoms and opportunities, they reveal themselves in their writings as having a healthy pessimism about human nature. They were fully aware of the hunger of men, not only for knowledge and affection but for domination and power, and expected that the place they would seek it was through control of government and expansion of government power. Their basic concern was to prevent tyranny; and if to be an American means anything at all, in political-philosophical terms, it means to hate tyranny, whether it be a tyranny of the many over the few or of the few over the many. It means to regard every man's life as uniquely precious, all human power as limited and limitable, all punishable wrongdoing as individual; to conceive of law as impersonal, with all equally subject; and to regard the state as an instrument of society and not the devourer of society.

No one will pretend that these American political philosophers embodied all wisdom, or that they created government as a heavenly institution, sacred for all time and perfect for all circumstances. But certainly none of the developments of the twentieth century gives any reason for rejecting their primary assumptions about the dangers of centralized and total power. Nor is there anything in the American philosophy to inhibit radical reformers.

But anyone who has once digested the philosophy and accepted its primary assumptions is at least provided with a frame of reference from which to judge its challengers.

The very first question which a properly educated American is bound to ask of any political movement is: Does the movement, for whatever considerations of good, or of human welfare, tend to the extension of uncontrollable and irrevocable power over the bodies, minds and souls of all or any part of the people? If it does, he will reject it. However inflamed he may be by the very real injustices, inequities, greed and other evils he sees about him, and however devoted to the objective of removing them, he will never hope to cure the many smaller tyrannies by one grand tyranny, however benevolent its promises. He may seek to use the state to break the power of private oligarchies, but never to supplant the oligarchy by a governmental despotism which is at one and the same time law, judge, policeman, employer, teacher and priest. For he will know from his training that there is no man, or party, or group of men, however originally high-minded, who can be trusted with such a monopoly of power.

Therefore, I think Miss Bentley's confession a true one. She had never become acquainted with the American Government. She grew up without understanding its assumptions. Otherwise she would never have become a communist.

Old Orchard Day

By Robert P. Tristram Coffin

Azure-and-gold peak of the year!
Sky like a Sandwich bowl, a deer
Slanting over an alder thicket,
Frostflowers like fallen sky, a cricket,
Still singing, inside an apple's core.
The day the boy at half past four
Will recall as he does his name
And the maple turned overnight to flame.

The orchard they glean is at the far
Island's end, remote as a star,
Walled around with wild pines singing.
Brothers shaking old limbs and bringing Thunderstorms of apples down,
Gold lightning hits the small boy's crown.
As they gather the fallen goods,
A smaller thunder rolls in the woods,
A partridge goes up there afraid
Of thunder that the tame things made.
Apples in bags, and spiked on briers,
Apples in grass like yellow fires,
Gnarled apple wood with holes in rings
Drilled by woodpeckers and wilder things.
The sun gone sudden, shadows crossed
Over the world, the smell of frost.

A small boy tired out, and then
Bags of apples, the boys and men
Crowded together on the sea.
Cold boy on the warm wide knee
Of a man rowing. The west a wall
Of fire, then no west at all,
Only stars and a man's deep sound
Going out singing far around
The night. The scent of apples, deep . . .
Last, the slanting deer, the sleep.

IF you want to get some questions for Information Please or any other quiz program, take a look at ANIMAL FACTS AND FALLACIES by Prof. Osmond Breland. Is there a manlike ape? What is the biggest baby in the world? How did the mermaid legend get started? How blind is a bat? How are kangaroos born? What mammal lives longest? What makes double eggs? Could the largest fish have swallowed Jonah? Can alligators and turtles mate? This, bear in mind, is not a book of humor, but of solid mammal-bird-fish-amphibian-reptile facts.

People who delight in cats are—we'd say invariably—people with a sense of humor. Cats don't lend themselves to solemnity. That's why cats are such good company and why books about them are almost always such good reading. KING TUT AND HIS FRIENDS, by John Hosford Hickey and Priscilla Beach, is all of that—very pleasant chatter about the authors' cat and other people's cats.

Tut himself didn't like certain radio voices. He was funny that way. If the radio voice spoke intelligently, in mellow tones and with proper inflections, he would listen respectfully, often going close to the radio. But if the speaker ranted, Tut would meow back at him, his meow getting louder as the speaker's voice rose. Whenever they wanted to find Tut, Miss Beach would play Debussy's Clair de Lune on the piano; and if they wanted to get rid of him, she had only to start Bach's Chromatic Fantasy and Fugue in D Minor.

There are also practical reasons for having a cat around, especially these days. In England during the war cats developed an acute discernment of the approach of bombs and would warn of danger by dashing for shelter. Similarly back in Messina, in 1783, a merchant reported a wonderful tale. He heard his cats scratching on the floor of the room in which they lived, trying to get out. When he released them, they still wanted frantically to escape. Out of curiosity he followed them outside into the open fields, where they started to dig themselves into the earth. In the meantime the earth quaked, and the house in which the merchant and his cats had lived was destroyed along with many near-by buildings.

There are many readers—including this department—who consider William Faulkner our foremost living American novelist. Like Balzac in the France of Louis Philippe, so Faulkner in the town of Jefferson, Mississippi, of today is painting an enormous canvas, novel by novel, of the life of his time. It may seem a microcosm of life—this small town in a Southern state—beside Balzac's France, but the issues are quite as important, and the emotions run if anything deeper. Mississippi, with its short but luscious blooming before the Civil War, and its long slow depression ever since, is peculiar in American history. As a state with a large proportion of Negroes, it poses the red-hot color question. With much mixed blood, it makes for melodrama. In Faulkner's novels strange figures wander through the stately old pillared mansions now moldering. Miscegenation, outside the law, has worked its tragic effects.

PIX

Faulkner's novels are never easy to read. People talk straight in his stories, but the motives behind what they have to say are complicated by fears, by evil, by madness, by knowledge unrevealed. THE INTRUDER IN THE DUST is actually one of his most direct stories; nonetheless, it is difficult reading. Sentences are sometimes two pages long with practically no punctuation. At first the unbroken vista of words seems insurmountable. But as you read on, you get used to it, and in retrospect you see that the style serves its purpose. For Faulkner enthusiasts the arrival of this novel is an event.

A wise, urbane and delightful book is WANDERING SCHOLAR, by Prof. M. A. Bonn, a German who has taught in many countries of the world and in many colleges across the United States.

Professor Bonn is now in his seventies, and looks back on a long, full life. He is a Frankfurt Jew, his family having lived in Frankfurt from 1543 up to Hitler. When writing about his youth in Frankfurt, he makes an observation which warrants some thinking:

"To belong to a small, not highly thought-of religious community is undoubtedly a social disadvantage. Yet the consciousness of being somewhat different from most of one's fellow citizens makes up for it; it gives one the vantage point of detachment. It may prevent one from being swamped by a craving for oneness with a more or less amorphous crowd; it contributes to a kind of personal integrity. It makes it easy to break away from hoary tradition; one has not to pay for personal freedom by being subjected to social excommunication, which might be strong

With demonstrations like this, Maytag dealers dramatize the fact that this range keeps on cooking—by stored-up heat—long after the gas is completely disconnected.

LAMP AVAILABLE AS ACCESSORY

You've never seen anything like it!

Only the new Maytag Dutch Oven Gas Range automatically turns off the gas and keeps on cooking.

Don't wait another day to see this remarkable range! See how its many modern features save you time, effort, fuel . . . how it keeps your kitchen cooler. It not only gives you every modern advantage for conventional cooking, but automatic cooking as well—by the time-honored Dutch Oven method. You don't even have to be there.

Place a whole meal in the oven . . . set the simple control . . . that's all you do till serving time. Then what a treat! No other method brings out flavor as does famed Dutch Oven cooking.

Gas burns but a fraction of the cooking period; turns off automatically at the proper time. Cooking is finished by stored-up heat, sealed in by the oven's super-insulation.

Approved by the American Gas Association for all gases. Specially engineered for each type of gas—city gas or L.P. (bottled gas)—to give best performance. Be sure to see it at your Maytag dealer's right away! The Maytag Company, Newton, Iowa.

If you're 45 or over, man or woman, you're a much better risk for your employer. According to a six-month survey made by the Labor Department on the work records of 18,000 workers of all ages, including 1300 women, "not only may the worker in the 45-or-over age group offer more highly developed skills, more mature judgment and more settled work habits as against the stamina and agility of youth, but he is frequently less likely to be absent and is less prone to injury than the younger workers."

Another advantage of being on the ripe side is the fun you'll have with a book called WHAT GRANDPA LAUGHED AT, by Homer Croy. It's an odd and amusing miscellany about what went on on the funny side, year by year, from 1893 to 1917. His favorite humorist is Kin Hubbard, who achieved fame on the Indianapolis News. Here are a couple of notes out of Hubbard's short unpublished autobiography:

"I married rather late in life, or after I got $300 together."

"I am taking up golf, although I feel as well as I ever did."

In a back issue of Harper's there is a delightful piece, Newport: There She Sits, by Cleveland (PROPER BOSTONIANS) Amory. In it is a record of a Newport wedding of 1946. Present were "not only a bride and a groom, but a daughter of the bride and the bride's ex-husband, two children of

Mr. Amory also describes the churches, with and without weddings. The box pews at old Trinity, in the good old days, were upholstered in the same colors as the liveries of the worshipers. In the rear of the late Edwin Morgan's pew, hung in crim-

All meats also contain the minerals—copper and phosphorus—in significant quantities.

Best-Known Functions of Protein

Complete protein has all ten of the essential amino acids the body must have to build, maintain and repair tissue. Needed by children in proportionately larger amounts than adults, for healthy growth.

Best-Known Functions of the B Vitamins

All are necessary for growth, vigor and general well-being. Thiamine—essential for healthy nerves, good appetite. Riboflavin—protects against certain eye and skin conditions. Niacin—for prevention of pellagra, a serious deficiency disease.

Best-Known Functions of Minerals

Iron—essential to hemoglobin, which carries oxygen in the blood. Deficiency causes anemia. Copper—apparently enables the body to utilize iron better. Phosphorus—combines with calcium in building bones and teeth.

YOU knew meat was good . . . but did you know it was this good? Your instinct has always said "Yes" to meat . . . now science tells why. And the chart above only begins to tell the story.

Notice that it lists complete protein as the kind meat has. This means meat protein has all of the ten essential "building blocks" or amino acids. This is important because these "building blocks" can work only as a team.

Laboratory research indicates that when even one of the ten is missing at a meal, the team can't go to work efficiently building muscle tissue and blood, and replacing worn-out body cells with fresh, new ones. None of these building blocks are missing when the meal is built around meat.

Sausage for breakfast, hamburger for lunch, roast for dinner—in any meat meal, you know that you are getting complete protein and all of its body-building benefits.

You may have overlooked an excellent book that came out in 1943: JOSHUA, by Thomas Costain and Rogers MacVeagh. It is now out in a new edition with introduction by Norman Vincent Peale (A GUIDE TO CONFIDENT LIVING). It is the biography of the great military genius, fighting in a land whose terrain is still unchanged, a master of logistics who carried on his campaign without even the aid of maps. It is based on the Bible story (which is included) and enriched by study of ancient folk songs and poems, and the findings of recent archaeological research. As Doctor Peale says, "It is invariably a fact that sincere and truth-seeking scholarship never weakens but always strengthens faith. . . . This book portrays a greater Joshua and implies even a greater God than afforded by the traditional conceptions." Besides all else, the author's explanation of the fall of the walls of Jericho is News.

MOUNTAIN MOTHERS . . . Maternity Center

NEXT STEPS IN MEDICAL CARE

by MARGARET HICKEY

EACH year thousands of babies come into the world miles away from modern hospitals and medical care. Childbirth and the diseases of pregnancy still represent the second leading cause of death among women between the ages of 20 and 35 in this country. About 2000 mothers and 30,000 newborn infants die yearly, most of them because of inadequate obstetrical and pediatric services.

The states with the highest mother- and infant-mortality rates are Georgia, Tennessee, South Carolina, Colorado, Texas and New Mexico. Lowest mortality figures are proudly recorded by Connecticut, New Jersey, Minnesota, Illinois, New York and Wisconsin. Even in the states with the best records, a substantial percentage of deaths is from causes classified as preventable.

In ten years infant-mortality rates have been reduced one third and maternal deaths nearly two thirds. But there are great differences in the care received by white and nonwhite patients, by urban and by rural mothers. Eighty-four per cent of white live births occurred in hospitals in 1945 (latest figures available); 40 per cent of the nonwhite births. Two per cent of all white births were unattended by a medical person, compared with 38 per cent of the nonwhite. Ninety-one per cent of all city mothers had their babies in hospitals, but only 61 per cent of those living in isolated districts were hospitalized for childbirth. Altogether, 176,972 mothers had no medical care at the time of their babies' births in 1945, and four out of five of these mothers lived in rural areas.

Now, with the help of the U. S. Children's Bureau, many states and individual communities will be able to bring medical care to localities where maternity services are most needed and least available. This little-known work is made possible through the extension of maternal- and child-welfare services under the Social Security Act. These funds were increased by Congress from $11,200,000 in 1946 to $22,000,000 for 1947–48. In many instances, the states match from their own treasury the amount of the Federal grant. States with the lowest per capita income receive the largest proportionate shares. While the state itself must administer these funds, it has the advantages of the services and the counsel of Children's Bureau specialists.

Many of the public-health nurses, so important to rural communities, are paid in part from maternal- and child-health funds. Maternity clinics, where women come for advice and help during pregnancy, are also a part of the program. Well-baby conferences take care of thousands. In New Mexico, nuns are being trained as midwives to attend the Spanish-speaking mothers and their babies. In Birmingham, Alabama, the Slossfield Health Center serves a large Negro community. In Southeastern Alaska, doctors and nurses arrive by boat to reach the native population. The Oneida Maternity Center, described in the accompanying article, furnishes a demonstration model for the modern rural lying-in hospital.

Whatever is done in the expansion of these services to mothers and children should be done as a part of a community-wide health program. Health councils need the combined efforts of the public-health department, the medical and dental societies, the school board and women's and civic clubs. Among the states pioneering in this type of health planning are Alabama, North Carolina, West Virginia, Vermont and New Jersey, with 21 school health councils.

In 1940 the extension bureau of the University of Virginia studied medical care in rural areas, and as a result developed the Virginia Council on Health and Medical Care, representing 40 or more groups. Supported by volunteer contributions, it has succeeded in increasing scholarships for medical study and has asked for more hospital facilities under the Hill-Burton Act. Such councils can do much to bring modern medical knowledge within the reach of the most isolated mother and child. THE END

AT the swinging footbridge Sarah paused and glanced back at the rough hill trail. The Oneida baby hospital was only a short distance on the other side, but the bridge approach had never looked so steep before. She wondered if she would find the strength to get across. It wasn't as though it were her first baby. She had had five. She was afraid—afraid of having a baby in the hospital for the first time. She wanted to turn back, but the fear inside her became a sudden shaft of pain. She knew she had to cross that bridge—now.

She could not have guessed then that tomorrow a stranger would be asking her curious questions like, "How did you like having your baby in a hospital?" Nor that she would answer, "Why, it was like a dream!"

From miles around, isolated mountaineer wives come to Oneida to have their babies in an excellently equipped delivery room and receive nursing care for a token charge of $1 a day if they can afford to pay. For most it is no dream, but it is better and safer obstetrical care than they have ever known. The Oneida Maternity Hospital, jointly supported by the state and the U. S. Children's Bureau, is the only rural lying-in hospital financed by public funds in the United States.

Oneida, Kentucky (population 300), is on Route 11, eleven miles east of Highway 21, in Clay County. Roads leading to Oneida are often barely passable, obstructed by landslides and full of mudholes almost deep enough to swallow an automobile. Where the roads end, mule paths follow the rivers snaking through the hills beyond.

Clay County frequently has the highest birth rate in Kentucky—one of the highest in the nation. In 1941 a survey of babies born in the county showed that more than 70 per cent were "ketched" by granny (Continued on Page 102)

MAKING MARRIAGE WORK

Happiness is unlimited. How to increase it is necessary knowledge.

BY CLIFFORD R. ADAMS

Ph.D., The Pennsylvania State College, Department of Psychology

COMPLAINTS OF UNHAPPY HUSBANDS

A WOMAN can often overcome her shortcomings as a wife, once she knows what they are. Unfortunately, finding out what her husband considers her shortcomings isn't always easy. Traits and habits of which she is unaware may disturb him deeply; she may even regard as wifely virtues some qualities—such as overzealous housekeeping—which seriously upset her husband.

We list below the complaints about wives most commonly associated with husbands' unhappiness in marriage. The list was compiled from the testimony of unhappy husbands participating in our continuous program of research into factors influencing married happiness. Though happy husbands also were questioned, their complaints were fewer, in their judgment less serious, and therefore less revealing to wives or husbands seeking guidance.

Our marriage is less happy than it should be because my wife——

"Lets her feelings be hurt too easily," say 20 per cent of unhappy husbands.

"Is nervous or emotional," say 18 per cent.

"Tries to improve me," say 16 per cent.

"Is quick-tempered," say 12 per cent.

"Is argumentative," say 11 per cent.

"Is easily influenced by others," say 11 per cent.

"Is a poor housekeeper," say 10 per cent.

"Criticizes me," say 9 per cent.

"Is jealous," say 9 per cent.

"Is not affectionate," say 8 per cent.

Many a conscientious wife may be surprised to find her at the top of the list "easily hurt feelings"—a trait which she knows she possesses, but had never thought of as grounds for complaint. Yet too easily hurt feelings can destroy the serenity of daily routine, and can make an emotional crisis out of a trivial incident. A husband who answers sharply when his wife talks to him while he shaves hasn't necessarily stopped loving her—he just isn't in the mood for conversation. The next time you feel like bursting into tears, ask yourself whether you have real reason to be upset—or whether you may be dramatizing a bit.

Nervous or emotional. This trait, though closely related to the first, is not identical. Aside from general personality maladjustments, a wife may be tense because she has worked too hard, slept too little or tried to do too much. More sleep and less work isn't an easy prescription for a busy housewife to follow, but it's worth it if it produces a more relaxed family atmosphere.

Tries to improve me. Marriage doesn't reform a man, or even change him very much basically, and the sooner a wife recognizes it the happier she and her husband will be.

The wife who is argumentative, or critical of her husband, often feels insecure and inferior herself, and is trying to relax her own tension by nagging at her husband. If she is quick-tempered as well, continuous quarreling is likely. Such a woman will do well to interest herself in a hobby or some outside activity, as an outlet of her own.

Jealousy often arises from a feeling of inferiority, rather than from a real cause. In either case, showing that you are jealous won't help. If you can't control your jealousy, at least conceal it.

Poor housekeeping. A man expects to support his wife; to create a comfortable and attractive home for him is her side of the bargain.

Lack of affection. A man may be undemonstrative, and still want reminders of his wife's affection. If you love him, let him know it.

Many other complaints were registered, including nagging, selfishness, extravagance, and more. But those we have discussed are the most common, and perhaps the hardest for a wife to see in herself.

The encouraging thing is that when we interviewed the wives of these husbands, many, who had not realized what they were doing, admitted the justice of the complaints, and were able to bring about an immediate improvement.

What are your husband's complaints? And can you, like the wives in our study, do something about them?

LIVING WITH IN-LAWS

FEW married couples, if they could do as they pleased, would choose to make their home with either set of in-laws. But emergencies often arise which make such an arrangement necessary, and today, because of the housing shortage, doubling up is particularly common.

Though sharing a home with in-laws may not be desirable, does it actually affect a couple's chances of married happiness? What can be done to minimize the difficulties of the arrangement? A recent study of the "living with in-laws" factors, based on the evidence of a thousand couples participating in our marriage prediction research, sheds light on both questions.

The study shows that living with in-laws is a definite handicap to married happiness. Evidence on this score is consistent and convincing. For example:

Of the couples who consider their marriage happy, 28 per cent have lived with in-laws at some time.

But among couples who rate their marriages unhappy, the proportion is 57 per cent, more than twice as many!

Clearly, living with in-laws is more than a mere inconvenience; it can be a real threat to happiness.

At the same time, the study makes it clear that the handicap is not insurmountable. Among happy couples, remember that more than one fourth have shared their homes with in-laws; further, among all the couples who have lived with in-laws, 27 per cent felt the arrangement worked out very well. Evidently the arrangement can be satisfactory.

What are the circumstances most favorable to success? If a young couple must move in with in-laws, how can they meet the situation with the best chance of happiness for everybody concerned? Here are suggestions based on the experience of couples in our survey:

1. The couple should pay a fair price, in money or its agreed-upon equivalent in work, for their board and lodging.

2. The husband's work (or the completion of his education and job training) should be satisfactory to him and approved by the parents with whom the couple lives.

3. He should not be in business with, nor work for, the parents with whom they live.

4. It's important that the parents be themselves happily married, that they genuinely want the young couple, and that they be free from financial difficulties.

5. The house should be large enough not only to accommodate the couple, but to assure some degree of privacy.

6. If either member of the couple opposes the idea of living with in-laws when it is first proposed, success is unlikely. Both must feel, without persuasion and from the very beginning, that living with in-laws can be a satisfactory arrangement.

7. If either member of the young couple was an only child, success is unlikely.

8. Living and financial arrangements and obligations of each family to the other should be defined and accepted by both families when they begin to live together.

Finally, when these conditions are met, there remains one essential: In this, as in all problems of marriage, one of the most significant factors is a realistic determination to make it work. If the two families, one mature and settled, the other recently established, are firmly resolved to work for the best interests of everybody concerned, if they are unselfish, tolerant and co-operative, they can live together in harmony, sometimes to the real advantage of both.

Are You Agreeable?

The ability to get along with others is an important asset, whether you are single or married. Answer these questions with a thoughtful "Yes" or "No."

1. Does it upset you to be told what you should do?
2. Are you offended when you are not invited to a small party?
3. Does it annoy you when a friend bungles a job you can do well?
4. Does it bother you to lose even a little argument?
5. Do you know someone you would like to put in his place?
6. When somebody hurts you, do you sometimes hold a grudge?
7. Do you hate to be told how to do a job?
8. Does anybody justifiably ever say that you are selfish?
9. Do you ever feel that most people are stupid?
10. Are there persons you would like to "tell off"?
11. In clubs you belong to, do you usually run for office?
12. Do you get a kick out of making others do your bidding?
13. Do some bossy people make you want to do the opposite of their wishes?
14. Do the ideas of some people you know "burn you up"?
15. Do most people need to be told what to do?
16. Is it easy for you to co-operate with the plans of others?
17. Do friends visit you at least once or twice a week?
18. Is your temper almost always under control?
19. Do you almost never have quarrels with tradespeople?
20. Are you nice to people you do not like?

Add the number of your No answers to the first 15 questions to the number of your Yes answers to the last 5 questions. With a score of 16 or above, you are probably a socially agreeable person. With a score of 11 or less, study your wrong answers to see how you can make yourself more pleasing.

DO YOU AGREE?

Does an only child have a tougher struggle in life than one with brothers and sisters?

Yes, in most cases. An only child, if unwanted, may grow up with no real sense of belongingness and security. At the other extreme, an only child is often overprotected and spoiled. In either case, maladjustment usually results.

The Trouble With—

BOYS... By Jerre Thieman

1. It's hard to get to know them. They call for a date, we speed off in a to a movie, dash in for a bite to eat, and that's the end. No long talks, no exange of ideas, no real understanding. Girls really don't need to be commercially ertained on every date. Some nights it's nice to stay home or perhaps walk to e corner drugstore. It isn't the car, it isn't the place—it's the boy.

2. They forget I've got ideas of my own. Sometimes I enjoy a hen party much as he enjoys stagging it. So if it's an extra-special date, I wish he'd call rly in the week. Girls honestly do have to plan things—their clothes take ore time than the boys would guess. We do meet fellows who think girls actuy like to be bossed. Don't forget, we've got heads on our shoulders too.

3. They should grow up. High-school guys don't have to show off to get tention. Girls notice other things, and most of us shy off from the bully. After while the "life of the party" gets tiresome, and who ever looked up to a practil joker? We really aren't looking for a guy who's always loud, always childish nd always the center of attraction.

4. They're speed demons on a date. A good-night kiss definitely is not ecessary, and necking and petting don't naturally come with time. There is uch a thing as dating a person purely because you like him and not because ou're in love. It isn't essential that you find your one-and-only in high school. t our age must we always fall in love; can't good times and fun be enough?

5. It's not easy to have them for friends. When I stop dating a fellow, t doesn't mean I stop talking to him. When we meet in the halls at school, why ct like strangers? When we find ourselves in the same crowd, why act like asual acquaintances? Breaking up with a boy doesn't mean breaking off riendship.

6. I like them, but I get tired of telling them so every minute. Sure I know Joe's a wonderful pitcher—but if I forget to ask him about baseball it doesn't mean that I've lost interest. Naturally, Johnny's got smart-looking clothes - but when I forget to tell him, he shouldn't think that I'm forgetting him.

7. I want them to be real. Nobody likes a steady sober-face, and nobody likes a guy who laughs at anything and everything. A fellow should be fun and cut up at the right time and still be able to think seriously at other times. Girls don't want bookworms for boy friends any more than they want fellows who detest any form of learning. It's sad, but true—popularity won't come to the shy and it won't come to those who "work at" having fun.

8. They are not socially mature. There are some common courtesies of life that all people should know, even that bold, brave, masculine species. Boys should make an effort to learn table manners, the correct actions on a date, and respect for older folks. It's a way of life everyone must master in order to grow up gracefully. The time you embarrass your date with bad manners may be the last time she is your date.

9. They hesitate to mix. Why is it that boys would rather die than ask a girl to dance in front of a few mutual friends? And when we're at a dance with several couples, why can't we exchange a few dances? The more mixing you do, the more people you'll meet—and people are so much fun when you know them.

10. They think all girls are alike. Just because one girl gives you a raw deal, n't think every girl would do the same. Alice may hand out phony excuses—ne Betty is sincere. Jane may want a big car and a night club—while Sue nts fun. Don't ever make the mistake of comparing us to a barrel of apples. ne bad one doesn't spoil the rest. Sometimes a boy gets hurt. Then he doesn't to figure out what really happened—just holds a grudge against all girls.

GIRLS... By Tom Weyl

1. Too many girls refuse to give a boy a pure simple answer of "yes" or "no" when asked for a date. They beat around the bush with, "Well, I don't know, I should study," or "Could I let you know tomorrow?" instead of saying definitely whether or not they'll go. Boys don't like to wait around for girls. They want to know where they stand.

2. Many girls seem to think that after a boy has dated them three or four times, they're going steady. Most boys like to play the field, but it's difficult to find a date who doesn't think the boy is committing a terrible sin by dating other girls. And when a girl starts talking of marriage, that's the boy's cue to move out—but quick.

3. Many girls, it seems, are afraid to tell one date that they've had other dates. This is silly. Although it can be overdone, there is a definite advantage in hearing where some other guy took your date. It gives you an idea of where, or where not, to take her yourself. It's also reassuring to know that your date gets around.

4. On the other hand, there are girls who talk of nothing but other dates. This gets very boring. The object—making the date jealous—may be reached but the girl's house may also be reached earlier than expected. The girl who drinks to excess—in other words, one who gets soused—is not popular long either. This is disgusting and won't be stood for by most boys.

5. Girls form cliques and consider boys outsiders or no-goods when they date girls from other cliques. It is even worse for a boy who dates a girl who doesn't belong to any of the "recognized" cliques. A boy won't take for long a girl who runs down other girls—or, particularly, other dates. It isn't hard to figure out that she'll do the same thing to him.

6. What boys dislike most, however, is artificiality. If a girl can't be natural, few boys will want to go out with her. Take, for instance, the girl who puts on the dog all evening; or the popularity girl who runs off to greet someone every other minute; or the girl who looks as if she's wearing a week's supply of make-up at one throw. Such things can be carried to extremes.

7. The prime requisite of any date is that she be able to talk. The idea of personality has been promoted in teen-age columns, but it can't be repeated often enough. It is not absolutely necessary that a date be good-looking. With boys today, if she can talk, looks are soon forgotten.

8. Too many girls never have any definite ideas on any subject. If a boy asks his date where she'd like to go, he wants to know. If it makes no difference to her, and she says so, then she shouldn't sulk around when he decides on a place. And if a boy is interested in a certain subject, and the girl knows it, she should try to be interested too. Most boys will do the same for most dates.

9. Following directly is what I call common decency and consideration. No boy likes to have his date try to teach him how to dance in the middle of the dance floor. Most boys are poor dancers and admit it, but if their date wants to improve them, she should suggest—tactfully—that they get together again in a more secluded spot. And when a girl introduces her date to someone else, it helps a great deal if she can give them some topic of common interest so that they won't stand around like two sad sacks when they could be carrying on a lively conversation, and learning more about each other.

10. Finally, girls sometimes forget that boys are the ones who have to pay for the evening. When a girl says to herself, "Expensive joint or no date," she will likely find herself with no date as soon as the boys wise up. And they aren't as dumb as some girls think. Boys are very anxious to get along with girls—but girls have to co-operate.

Make Speech a Game

By Alan Coutts

DID you ever sit back and listen to your children talk? Not just to what they say, but to the way they say it?

Any speech teacher will tell you that the speech level in this country is deplorable. But there is little the teacher can do about it. Good speech habits, like good health and eating habits, must be built upon foundations laid in the home.

Tonight, when your family is gathered around the dinner table, see how your youngsters stack up in this respect. Do they enunciate properly, bringing out each word clearly and distinctly? Do their sentences have emphasis, color, vocal enthusiasm, so that it would be a pleasure to hear them talk even if you couldn't understand the language they were speaking?

If that's the case, you may give yourself a big pat on the back—for they learned that manner of speech from you.

But be fair now—do you find, as you listen, poor enunciation and articulation? Do your offspring mumble their words? Do they run words together, or fill in gaps with "uhs" or "ands"?

Then yours are typical American youngsters—practically all young America does precisely these same things. And if you'll listen to yourself and analyze your own speech, ten to one you'll find that you do them too.

For speech is imitative. To illustrate: all nationalities in the Southern States produce children who have Southern accents; negroes in Jamaica have British accents; most people in Brooklyn say "bot-le" for bottle and "becauss" for because; all too often children whose mother lisps will do the same, whose father speaks ungrammatically will say "he don't" until some teacher breaks them of the habit painfully and embarrassingly.

Parents, if your children have starved speech, change their diet, give them some home-cooked remedies, make them as articulate as they are healthy.

The remedy can be fun. Play a game at the dinner table. Before you start on the salad, hold a contest for the whole family to see who can talk for sixty seconds without using a vocalized stall; that is, without saying "wella," "anda" or just plain "uh." Choose a subject, such as "What I Did Today," or "An Amusing Incident I Saw." Time the contestant and rap a cup with a spoon the first time he makes the fatal error. Go around the table, each of you standing and taking your turn. Start with yourself, mother, or call on father first. You know how much your youngsters enjoy doing something better than you.

HERE are some clues on how to improve the flow of your speech. Vocalized stalls are the result of faulty thinking, of thinking in terms of words instead of ideas. To illustrate with a parallel, take the process of learning to type. First you must learn the keyboard, as a small child must learn the sounds used in speech. From there the typist progresses to words. But if that is as far as he goes he never attains any speed, any real proficiency. He must begin to grasp whole groups of words, whole sentences, whole lines, and be so equipped with the finger skill of typing that he no longer has to think of the keyboard or the manipulation of his hands on the machine. So it is with speech. To rid yourself and your children of the meaningless wax words, the irritating "uhs" that clutter up the good human sounds we call language, you must help them to think not in words but in ideas. Try it at your dinner table.

One of the chief reasons people are so nervous about standing and talking in front of an audience, even a small one composed of friends, is that they are word-poor. Every day in my classes I hear students trying to express an idea that will not clarify with "and so forth," or "something like that," or "well, you get the idea." The audience does not get the idea, the speaker knows that his audience doesn't understand, and his nervousness increases. If only he knew the right word his point would be made, and he would feel a confidence that is priceless.

TAKE a look at a new big Webster's International Dictionary. Do you realize that the average person in the United States can claim a speaking knowledge of less than one inch of that book? It would be absurd to expect you to acquaint your family with all the words in the dictionary, but you can play another game at the dinner table which will help all of you to become more articulate. I know of a family that played it for years with excellent results. Each person came to the table with a new word encountered during the day in conversation, a newspaper or book. In turn they pronounced the word, defined it and used it in a sentence. There were six in the group. They kept at it almost daily for fifteen years. Do a little arithmetic on that. The father, foreign-born, who had had about four years of formal schooling, was a leader in the community, an easy speaker and a fine example to his children. The three boys are successful men in their professions, the daughter a good mother who is playing the game with her own children.

Much fun and benefit can be had out of an old laundry list. Pass it around the table and ask each person to read it in a different manner, such as "angrily," "beseechingly," "heroically," "fearfully," "ironically," "humorously." Each emotion must be expressed entirely with the voice. Certainly there is nothing particularly angry about "doilies, tea cloths, napkins, sheets, pillowcases," and so on. But flexibility, color, range, stress, force, pause and emphasis can be discovered and exercised.

Just as you train your children not to speak with their mouths full of food, so should you train them not to speak with their mouths almost closed. It is not so much a matter of reprimanding your offspring as it is that of being a good example to them. Most of the speech difficulties in this country can and should be taken care of in the home. More than once I have sent mothers home with the children they brought for instruction by saying, "Why pay me to do this when you can do it so much better yourself—at home?" For cases requiring special treatment, a speech teacher or a clinic is the right place, but for the ordinary faults of poor diction, slovenliness, monotone, faulty breathing, the home is the best place to begin.

You don't depend upon the school for your children's diet; the lunchroom only carries on the good meals you prepare at home. So it should be with speech. Change the diet of speaking, fill in the deficiencies, fatten your family with new words for fluency. And when you have done for your children, send them to their speech teachers for polishing. Do your part in making the level of speech in this country as high as our health. THE END

Journal About Town

EUROPEAN

In poll of Journal editors, "Gurusome Twosome" Wallace (right) and Taylor get 7 votes. Truman, 7 votes; Dewey, 29.

AFTER taking many presidential polls, Dr. George Gallup observes that as soon as people know who the nominees are, voting minds are made up and seldom change. But as we went to press for this issue, no poll had been published which forecast the coming election, so we held a secret ballot of the editorial staff; and all we can say is that if the JOURNAL masthead is anything like a cross section of country-wide political sentiment, there should be no doubt about next month's result. For out of a total of 59 editors, 29 on the first of August cast their votes for Dewey, and only 7 for Truman, which seemed then a little out of line, though no more out of line than the fact that 7 also cast their votes for Wallace and Taylor, dubbed by Mr. Gould the "Gurusome Twosome." Nine editors hadn't yet made up their minds; one wasn't voting and six were away. . . . Well, let's see how close it comes to the real thing when November second arrives.

A man who signed himself, "Magically yours, Zovello," wrote us the other day about his school of magic up the street, "attended by doctors, lawyers, teachers, bankers, and even a New York City magistrate." Besides teaching tricks, he's an expert, he claims, at exposing psychic frauds, as is also one of his star pupils, Richard Himber, the orchestra leader. Himber was stumped, however, one day at the school when a girl student, offering to "read" his mind, told him of a contract which he had signed that morning, giving details of a highly confidential nature. Himber rushed out to a broadcast rehearsal in a state of great excitement; whereupon the girl confessed to Zovello that she was the public stenographer who'd just been typing Himber's contract.

IRVING DESPOR

Maestro Himber tries a new trick.

Figures indicate that 84 per cent of employed women work because they must; another 8 per cent work for some specific purpose; the rest because they like to work or want extra money. . . . Among certain African natives, the word for heaven is "bingo." . . . There are 51 women judges now serving in this country. Three are Federal judges. Of the states, New York, with ten, has the most women judges. . . . Chicago, reputed to be the windiest city in the U. S., isn't at all. Twenty-one cities are windier, with Buffalo, New York, windiest of all. . . . More men are color-blind than women by a ratio of 8 to 1. . . . In Philadelphia, movie-theater managers say they can tell by popcorn sales how the movie appeals to moviegoers. If sales are high, it's a man's picture. If not, women are its most ardent fans. . . . Did you know that flowers themselves carry a message? Gladioli mean "Give me a break—I'm really sincere"; yellow lilies, "I'm walking on air!"; dark crimson carnations, "I'm carrying the torch for you." With daffodils, it's "The sun is always shining when I'm with you." An orchid means "Beautiful lady"; but with yellow carnations, watch out—"You have disappointed me." . . . The American divorce rate was down in 1947—the first decrease from a previous year since 1932. Chief reasons: the peak of breakdowns from war marriages is believed to be past; people getting married today are more mature and better prepared for marriage.

In going over a recent report from the Institute of Food Technologists, Louella Shouer was pleased to read that women, as tasters, are almost twice as sensitive as men. Roughly 250 men and an equal number of women were tested on the four basic tastes—sweet, sour, salt and bitter—with filter papers dipped, respectively, in solutions of sugar, citric acid, salt and quinine sulphate; and just to be mean, there was a blank paper too: 46 per cent of the men passed perfect tests, and 77 per cent of the women. Louella says the report also gave the result of a questionnaire to determine which of the sexes preferred their foods excessively sweet, salty and sour. The women came out way ahead on that one also, hands down.

Ever since she read somewhere how the wardrobe women at Warner Brothers had found it took six yards of material to make a lady's bathing costume for a film with a story of 1900, a very pretty girl in our beauty department, Leone Seastrom, has been brooding about the fact that with the same amount of material she'd be able now, in 1948, to whip up not only a perfectly adequate bathing suit, but have enough goods left over to make herself a long, wide, billowing party skirt besides.

Accepting the Navy's invitation to our Homemaking Department to inspect their first new enormous Lockheed Constitution recently over at Floyd Bennett Field, Elizabeth Goetsch was understandably drawn to the kitchenette-size galley. Kitchenette-size, she says, to look at, but full kitchen capacity when you consider it can serve, on featherweight plastic plates, 300 meals at a time. For if they want to carry nothing but passengers, the Navy man told Elizabeth, they can tuck in well over 300, to explain why he'd mentioned that many meals. "But what do you do about the dirty dishes?" our home economist asked. "Oh, we just turn them in for clean ones at the next landing field—still dirty!"

A lady from Kennebunk, Maine, has sent us a little piece out of The Living Church, which tells about what must be by now the most deliberately read single copy of the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL ever printed. The item describes how a group of women missionaries at the Mosse Memorial Hospital, outside the city walls of Ta Tung Fu, in China, have been marooned by the communist forces; the only piece of current reading matter they've had in months being a copy of this magazine. To make it last, like castaways with a precious supply of water, they're reading it a page at a time—one page a day.

KINFOLK

Neither pain nor death, anguish nor violence, could conquer one woman's love for them. Beginning a new serial • By Pearl S. Buck

THE theater in Chinatown was crowded to the doors. Every night in the year actors brought from Canton played the old Chinese plays and every year the businessmen voted enough money to bring them back again. The theater was a bulwark of home for them. Their children went to American schools, spoke the American language. The fathers and mothers were not highly educated people and they could not express to the children what China was. But in the theater the children could see for themselves. Here history was played again and ancient heroes came to life before their eyes. Parents brought their children early and stayed late. They talked with friends and neighbors, exchanged sweetmeats and gossip, and sat spellbound and dreaming when the curtain went up.

The play tonight was Mu Lan, the story of the heroine of a thousand years ago, who took her father's place when he fell in battle and so saved her nation from the invaders. This was a favorite play, and although it was nearly midnight the citizens of Chinatown waited with excitement for the curtain to rise on the fifth act.

At this moment Billy Pan, the manager of the theater, came to the door and looked over the crowd, searching for possible celebrities. It pleased the crowd if he could produce a celebrity after the show. At the middle seat in the tenth row his eyes halted. Dr. Liang Wen Hua! He had seen Doctor Liang only once, and then from a platform in Uptown New York, when during the war delegates from Chinatown had been invited to come to a celebration of Double Ten. Doctor Liang had made the chief address, and all the delegates had taken pride in the tall, handsome figure. But Doctor Liang had never accepted an invitation to Chinatown—he made the excuse that he could not speak Cantonese—yet here he was tonight.

The curtain went up, and through the darkness Billy Pan edged his way up the narrow aisle. At the tenth row he paused, whispered and waited. The man in the seat next to Doctor Liang came out obediently, and Billy Pan pushed into his place.

"Doctor Liang?" he whispered respectfully.

Doctor Liang turned his head.

"Excuse me, this is Billy Pan, proprietor of theater. I saw you. Great honor, I am sure! I am sorry you did not tell me you are coming and I would have better seat."

Doctor Liang inclined his head. "I am very comfortable, thank you," he said in his low, rich voice.

"You not come before, I think?"

"As a professor, I am kept busy," Doctor Liang replied. "I came to see whether my students might understand this play, as presented by Chinese actors."

"It is too poor," Billy Pan exclaimed.

Doctor Liang smiled. "I suppose American students will not be critical."

Behind them and beside them people were craning their heads. Everybody knew Billy Pan would not trouble himself about any ordinary person.

"Doctor Liang," Billy Pan begged. "I ask a great favor of you."

SEARCH FOR A

The search for a soul begins when our eyes open, and closes only when they close; but the choice of the individual's goal is unconsciously settled by himself in childhood.

My reason for writing these memoirs only up to the age of eighteen is that after adolescence we enter a new region of living where we cease to be an object with whom life is still at play, and become subjects playing upon life.

I have tried to write the truth about my own early and mistaken choice of character as well as to portray the influences which no doubt strengthened my choice. I had inevitably to show a critical attitude toward others besides myself. My parents are dead and cannot suffer from my criticisms, but I hope that I have not acted with disrespect toward their memories, since the mistakes I believe that they made were largely due to the insincerities and sentimentalities of their period, while the debt that I owe them for their unfailing love is one that I could never repay.

Such a study as I have attempted has only one aim and can have only one merit, that it is as true as I am able to make it.

CHILDREN who are born in May start well in the world and look on sunshine as their natural heritage. I was in this way among the most fortunate of children, for I was born on the night when May turns into June, in the year 1884—and my parents were young; and having suffered the bereavement of the loss of a boy a year before, they gave me a double share of their hearts.

My first memory is of sunshine, sitting on a green bank and knocking off the heads of grasses my mother held out to me for the purpose. I can also well remember my first journey to a new home when I was little over two years old. The Wantage Hill has impressed many people by its stubborn length—so that it is not surprising that it impressed a baby on the eternity of a wet afternoon, especially one who was not allowed to get out and pick the drenched bluebells in the hedges. The one horse climbed slowly—the rest of the family got out and walked to ease it. My mother and I were left alone inside watching the rain, the bluebells, the walkers and the horse. I remember nothing else—what we thought of the vicarage in the Berkshire village of Fawley-under-the-Downs when we arrived that day I have no idea. The memories of the two years we spent there (we seldom stayed for more than two years anywhere) are not consecutive, but many of them are very clear; and probably the most formative of a lifetime.

My mother was delicate, extremely beautiful, and very happy. My father was in the best of health and good spirits. By birth and upbringing he was American—but only of one generation, since his father had emigrated from a village in Derbyshire at the age of twenty-four, and his mother's parents came direct from the Isles. My mother was Yorkshire on both sides. I had two elder sisters, Wilmett and Mary, though I cannot remember them very well at this time.

Far more plainly stands out the birth of my baby brother. I did not want him, for I had been—and thought I safely was—"baby" par excellence. I had all the rights and privileges common to the youngest. My elder sisters were almost inconceivably older than myself—five and nearly seven years' seniority kept them well away from all my prerogatives. Why then should anything else happen to shake me? Yet the earthquake came. I was taken to see the baby. It was an extremely thin, ugly and unresponsive mite, yet I began to like it. It was alive. Later on, so I was assured, it would be more alive still. Very soon the creature began to respond to me: it watched me with its enormous brown eyes, it smiled when I leaned over and gently poked it. I was allowed to hold it, and it became "George."

I may say that though I loved my sister Mary with a lifelong depth of sisterly affection, and hated my sister Wilmett with a fervent passion, probably the deepest of my family feelings was for this strange creature that shared my nursery.

The second year of my life ran with a golden ease, and I remember only one sharp check that happened on my third birthday. Our household consisted, besides my parents and two sisters, of a cook called Lizzie, a lovable, red-cheeked parlormaid named Rose, and the gardener, my greatest friend, whose name was Ado. To celebrate my third birthday he presented me with what I felt to be a miracle. It was a double white tulip in a pot. He told me the tulip needed regular and careful watering or it would die, and then went off to his dinner.

I was alone on the terrace with this immaculate flower. I suppose the tulip must have been a very fine specimen—standing tall and stately with its white cup lifted to the sky. I know my heart was bound up in it. All that I wanted of it in return was that it should remain alive and beautiful forever—and, of course, mine. A dreadful fear began to invade my imagirtion. How long had Ado been gone? How soon should it be watered ain? Ado had already just watered it. Would it not die if it were not wa-ed again? I had a small watering can, but it was nowhere in sight. In-ead, on the path leading to a water tap in the garden wall, was Ado's ormous watering can, a thing that in less flurried moments I should not ve considered that I was capable of lifting. But love, we are told, finds a y. I therefore hurled myself upon the watering can, dragged it to the b. A bright shaft of water soon filled the huge can to its brim, and slop-ng in every direction, I staggered manfully across the sunny terrace. hen I reached my tulip's side there it was blooming as highly and se-nely as before. I tipped the watering can, and the flood came. The tulip eled, staggered and fell forward into a bath of muddy water, its proud ad bowed forever.

I remember to this day the helpless chill of my grief as I stood looking what my love had done to the object of its devotion. I had quite literally ttered the life out of it. I don't know how long I stood there. I don't ow who found me or tried to administer comfort to me.

There was something in the universe that from that day I deeply dis-usted. Again and again in afterlife I was to see or feel in myself, or in me other person dear to me, an imaginary danger—one that had no real ncern with me—and put out all my powers to save it; and again and ain I have watched the white tulip fall.

Not all white tulips were as wholly innocent as the one I drowned on y third birthday. Nor, thank heaven, did all the objects of my care come so quick and formidable an end.

During this autumn my mother's ill health flung its first real shadow er us. Her lungs became slightly threatened and the doctor suggested a inter in the South of France. I have a feeling that at this time the fabric that enchanting happiness that hung about our early lives first began be shaken. It was not that my father loved my mother any the less, nor e him, but the tremendous gulf between their hidden aims began to ow through the wear and tear of everyday life. My mother dreaded life. he hated unknown and uncontrollable forces. She had no confidence hatever in herself—or in my father—or in destiny.

Her early youth had been very unhappy till she met my father—then, d only then, had she become important and idolized. She set to work un-nsciously to hold my father away from any and every other contact. he wanted him for herself alone. She did not interfere with his parish duties, but she always refused to share them. No clergyman's wife I ever knew so sedulously avoided any contact with her husband's duties. She did not even wish to hear about them. Above all, she would not allow—if she could help it—any social life under her own roof. Her husband, her home and her babies were all she would acknowledge as her business in life.

If my father demanded more of her in any direction she promptly became too ill to allow of even the slightest effort. There was never really anything at all serious the matter with my mother. She had, we were often assured by many able physicians, a particularly good constitution and sound organs. She thought she had contracted malaria at my birth. She had frequent and severe headaches. I do not know what would have happened to her at the hands of modern science. Many doctors from time to time tried to bring her out of these fancied ailments, but she merely disposed of the doctors, never of the ailments.

At first we all, including my father, believed in my mother's illnesses and were terrified of them. Then I think very gradually my father's eyes were opened, but ours were not. She was for her children not only madly dear—but mysteriously threatened. She went to church, she read enormously; she was the loving, gentle and beneficent background of our lives, but more and more she withdrew into herself like a sea anemone at the mere touch of any outside hand. All her rare intelligence, her sparkling humor, her perfectly sweet, sound temper were confined to the home. It cost her a great deal to leave us for the South of France, and she never, after this one absence, failed to take the whole family with her when her health became endangered.

But before this break occurred, we enjoyed the first of those American visits which became the romance of our lives. The American grandparents crossed the ocean, accompanied by young Uncle Frank on his way to take up a medical "vocation year" at Berlin.

My grandmother I remember on this first occasion only as a Presence, something large and fiery, and full of the most stimulating sense of drama, but always benevolent and pleasing drama; gales of laughter beset her path; her eyes danced; her deep, emphatic voice seemed a kind of human thunder with no ill effects.

My grandfather was on an altogether smaller scale; but I loved him as I have never loved anyone before or since—he was the only wholly flawless human being I have yet met. He had (Continued on Page 170)

The Rebellion of Willy Kepper

GIVE SOME GUYS AN INCH AND THEY'LL TAKE YOUR GIRL. • BY WILLARD H. TEMPLE

WILLY KEPPER got the bad news on a Friday morning at nine-twenty-seven. He had a sheaf of letters and telegrams in one hand, a pencil between his teeth, and, as he had hoped, his brisk heel-and-toe pace carried him within range of Mary Frost, filing clerk.

Mary was slim and chestnut-haired, with astonishingly large eyes, and in the six months of her employment every male wolf in the concern, from the top-executive level on down, had made his play and been neatly and painlessly repulsed.

"Good morning, Willy," Mary said, and flashed her famous smile.

Willy's mouth opened, the pencil nose-dived, and Willy caught it neatly in his right hand, not breaking his stride. "'Morning," said Willy laconically, moving on past her, and nobody in the world could possibly have known that what Willy meant was, Good morning, my dear, you have never looked so lovely.

A lean young man with a boyish look and a permanent air of being in a hurry, Willy shot on down the corridor toward the shop and then halted abruptly outside Mr. Clayton's sanctum.

He went inside and the ordinarily genial sales chief had a withdrawn look that made Willy apprehensive.

"Willy," Mr. Clayton said, "I have bad news. I promised you the next opening in sales. And Carter is leaving the office this week. Going into the field. I'd recommended you for his job, but they've been pulling wires over my head. There's a new man coming in. Ogden, his name is."

Willy's head came up and Mr. Clayton's smile was ironic.

"Yes," Mr. Clayton continued, "he's Jasper Ogden's son. Of course Mr. Ogden is no longer active in the business, but he controls forty per cent of the stock. His son graduated from college last week and his proud papa has the brilliant idea of installing him in Carter's place. He wants him to begin at the bottom, so he says. He has odd ideas about where the bottom is located." Mr. Clayton paused suddenly as though he had said too much. "Sorry, Willy," he finished. "We'll have another opening someday."

Willy, not trusting himself to speak, turned and went outside and into the shop to check an order. Workmen spoke to him, but Willy walked faster than ever and didn't see them.

His mind went back over the years. He was a seventeen-year-old kid again, a gawky, rawboned youngster leaving school and, cap in hand, walking up the steps where the sign read EMPLOYMENT OFFICE. A long time ago.

You fill out an application and pass your physical. You get a locker and put on a paint-stained uniform. You wrestle steel drums and unload paint and develop muscles you never knew you had. And finally they teach you how to make the paint. With (Continued on Page 268)

HOW CAN WE GET THE SCHOOLS WE WANT?

The kind of world you are preparing for your child will be determined by today's school. • By T. R. McConnell

THERE is an old saying that a man of words and not of deeds is like a garden full of weeds. This can also be held true of a nation. We are now aroused to the need for extending and bettering our educational facilities; the prime question is: What are we going to do about it?

In the research that has been done, the studies made, a comprehensive program clearly emerges, a program which I consider four-pronged in purpose, and vital to the action demanded from the communities, the states and the Federal Government.

This program is:

1. We should broaden our conception of education to include social, emotional and moral attitudes as well as intellectual abilities, in order that we may surmount the problems of our time and live the full, rich lives open to us.

2. We should see that educational opportunities are equally available to all, regardless of race, color, sex, creed, age and money.

3. We should extend public education beyond the high-school level for a larger number of deserving students.

4. We should improve the quality of education at all levels.

An education which is adequate for today's world involves far more than the mastery of fundamental skills in reading, spelling, mathematics and the like, essential as these tools are in school and in life. It goes beyond a knowledge of literature, science, history, economics, political science and other subjects. The true measure of the schools' effectiveness is how pupils live and work together in the school itself, and later how they behave as citizens, workers, members of families, and as decent, resourceful, self-respecting people. In other words, the test of education is how well one can utilize the skill and knowledge, the methods of learning and problem solving acquired in school when he faces the situations of everyday life. When tested in this concrete way, education which emphasizes knowledge alone is glaringly deficient. Education which measures up to the demands of modern life requires students to face their ethical and moral responsibilities, for these values determine to a large degree the character of human relationships.

Two years ago, President Truman appointed a Commission on Higher Education and charged it with the task of defining the responsibilities of colleges and universities in American democracy and in international affairs. The twenty-eight members of the commission included distinguished laymen as well as educational leaders. The commission's report was published in six volumes covering the functions of higher education, the need for equalizing educational opportunity, the provision of teaching and administrative staff, the organization of higher education, and the means of financing colleges and universities. Although in treating the functions of higher education the commission discussed the importance of specialized and professional training in modern society, it put particular emphasis on the importance of a unifying general education for all students. General education, of course, is not the exclusive province of colleges and universities. It is the responsibility of education at all levels, for it is concerned with the means of living a rich and satisfying personal life and with the activities in which all men and women engage as citizens, workers and members of family groups.

Like the articles in the JOURNAL series, the commission's report characterized education not in terms of what an educated man should know, but in terms of what he should do. It recognized that in order to act intelligently, one must possess a great deal of relevant information. But it emphasized that knowledge is not enough. For example, it pointed out that in order to live effectively in a rapidly changing world, modern man must learn how to revise his store of information and how to modify and reorganize his ideas in the light of new discoveries and new conditions. Futhermore, said the commission, purposeful behavior depends on motives and attitudes. A citizen is not likely to put his knowledge and his ideals to work in the community unless he feels a personal responsibility for the welfare of others as well as himself.

To attain understanding and knowledge that "man is not an island" many things are necessary: a code of ethics, objective thought, the ability to express oneself and communicate with others, mental and physical health—all the ingredients of true maturity.

Because a misguided minority can seduce a multitude, and one fool can panic a crowd, it is vital to our democracy that all of us become educated. Because better living means happier living, our obligation is also our pleasure. So—our second task becomes that of seeing that education is available to all.

At present there are numerous barriers to equal educational opportunity. Limited economic resources constitute one of these barriers in great regions of our country, especially in the South. Particular communities in wealthier states may also have relatively limited financial resources. Young people who live in these areas are denied education equal in quality to that which is offered in more fortunate communities.

Madame René Degas—Painted 1872-1873

SOME of the best French paintings of the last century, curiously enough, were painted in America. Hilaire Germain Edgar Degas—1834–1917—whom many critics consider the greatest French artist of his generation, went to New Orleans in 1872. His mother had been born there, and his uncle and brothers had established themselves as cotton merchants. In a letter he describes his gratitude to one of his brothers, René, whose wife appears in the painting reproduced: "I knew neither English nor the art of traveling in America, so I obeyed him [René] blindly. I should have been lost without him! He is married, and his wife, our cousin, is blind, almost hopelessly blind, poor woman! She has borne him two children and is about to have a third, whose godfather I shall be; and, as the widow of a young American killed in the War of Secession, she has also brought him a little girl nine years old." With tactful subtlety Degas has suggested the blind, unfocused stare of his sister-in-law. The portrait seems unposed, the sitter unself-conscious. Thus Degas conveys that feeling of fortuitous objectivity which was his goal in portraiture. As he once said, he was interested in doing "portraits of people in familiar and typical attitudes, above all in giving their faces the same choice of expression as one gives to their bodies." Consequently, he sought to transcribe appearance accurately, to achieve photographic veracity, as though the camera had just clicked and the artist had transposed to the canvas his exact mental picture. But though the casual yet perfectly balanced design of this canvas has the immediacy of a snapshot, the artist, because draftsmanship is more flexible than photography, has been able to eliminate all extraneous detail and to concentrate attention on the important features of his sitter. Unfortunately, contemporary portraiture has lost the secret of combining aesthetic perception with photographic likeness.

Father tells the Truth

ILLUSTRATED BY COBY WHITMORE

IT WAS A QUESTION NO MAN SHOULD HAVE HAD TO ANSWER—ESPECIALLY BEFORE HIS WIFE. • BY VAL TEAL

ONE thing about my father, he's honest. Mother came down the street with this new hat in a hatbox, swinging the box by the tape handle. "Must be something special," father said, watching her through the window. "The way she's swinging along."

The hat was something special. Mother came in and set it on the dining-room table.

"Put some water on in the teakettle," she told me. "We'll have lunch in a jiffy. I'm starved. But first, I want to show you something." And her voice was all quivery.

"We had lunch," I said.

"It's almost two," father said.

"No wonder I'm so hungry," mother said. "Put the water on for tea for me, then. I brought some rolls. Don't you want some with me? Just wait till you see this," she said. She was having trouble with the tape ties on the box. But then she got it and she lifted out this hat. "Isn't it a dream?" she said. "It's a hat." And she held it high on her hand and looked at it.

"Glad you told me," father said. "I thought it was a coat you needed so much."

"Oh, I do," mother said. "I do. I do. Mine is so definitely old look. But"—and she sighed—"I couldn't afford a coat. So I got this extra-special hat. When I wear it no one will look at my coat. Don't you love it?" she said.

"I guess so," father said. "After all, what's a hat without a woman under it?"

Mother laughed. "You shall have the woman," she said, "in a moment. It's a name hat," she said. "Do you know what that means?"

"Yes," father said. "They put your name in it."

"Not my name," mother said. "The big designer's name. It's designed by a man so well known in the millinery field that his name is sewed in his creations. This is one of the cheaper ones, of course, but some of these hats run way up in price. In the hundreds."

"Apiece?" father said.

"Sure, apiece," mother said. "They don't come in dozens. There is only one of a kind, and that name in a hat," mother said, and she showed the name inside the hat to father, "makes women green with envy."

"I should think, then, it would be sewed on the outside," father said. "A couple of very common names for such a whiz of a hat," he said.

Mother laughed. "Sewed on the outside!" she said. "That would be bragging. It doesn't need to be. Women who know enough to get green can tell without the sign."

"Then," father said, "why sew it in?"

"For proof, I suppose," mother said. "In case of a challenge. You know what?" mother said. "The designer of this hat might meet me on the street if he came to town and he'd recognize the hat, of course, and if he liked it he'd bow low and say, 'My compliments, madame,' or something like that. But if he didn't, you know what he'd do? He'd stop dead in his tracks, and say, 'Madame, that hat was not meant for you!'"

"Well!" father said. "Do people know when he's coming, so they can be careful?"

"I don't know," mother said. "It doesn't worry me. This is my hat. The clerk said so. It makes me feel young and gay and important just to read the label. You know what I might do?" she said. "I might save the label and sew it in a cheaper hat later."

That shocked father. "You wouldn't really?" he said.

Mother looked up at the ceiling and considered it. "I'm not sure. It would depend on if I thought I could get away with it. Anyway, here goes. This hat is a hat. It takes putting on. Don't go away. I'll be right back."

She went into the lavatory where she has mirrors arranged on opposite walls so she can see all sides of herself. (Continued on Page 248)

This Rita was very special. I thought she was going to be as old as mother, but she wasn't; she was just a young girl—and was she somepn?

Why do Women Cry?

BY GRETTA PALMER

WHY do women cry? Why do women cry? Crying in the America of today is almost as exclusively a woman's habit as the use of lipstick. Most men simply don't cry. Very complete U. S. Army reports on the reactions of soldiers under conditions of stress and sorrow list such symptoms as gritted teeth, clenched fists, vomiting, trembling, fainting—but not one case in a hundred mentions tears. Men may still "cry into their beer"—but not until it is the tenth beer. Crying, in our day, is a woman's monopoly.

But among women tears are an acknowledged commonplace. Psychiatrists, social workers and even businessmen have been forced to figure out methods of dealing with the uncomfortable presence of a woman caller, drooping by their desks and dabbing at her eyes. The credit manager of one of New York's largest department stores has found that one third of all women customers who are in arrears will cry when they sit down at his desk; he keeps a box of facial tissues in his top drawer, silently peels one off and hands it to the tearful customer. ("Usually," he says, "it makes her stop. I don't know why.")

Such pat devices don't fit all occasions of weeping. Social workers and psychiatrists agree that crying in women can be a symptom of any one of a hundred different emotional states; no single method of handling all the situations has been worked out. The Young Women's Christian Association workers have found they may have to use five or six different techniques in handling crying girls within a single week. These vary from a pat on the shoulder to elaborate indifference, sympathetic silence or the recommendation, "Go ahead. Have a good cry." The personnel manager of a chain of restaurants believes that "tears are a good sign. They mean the girl has already found a partial answer to her worry. I tell her so."

Psychologists and physiologists would agree with the personnel manager: recent research studies indicate that a fit of crying comes after the crisis has been passed and that it is always accompanied by a feeling of relief. Most students of the subject hold that tears are nature's first step in restoring the balance of the nervous system depleted by grief or rage.

Dr. T. A. Ribot, author of Psychology of the Emotions, says, "Secretion of the tear glands depends on an increase in the blood pressure. But sorrow means a lowering of the circulation. Therefore, in the early stages of sorrow, tears are lacking. Tears come only at the second stage of slackened tension, when the return of vitality has begun. They produce relief."

Dr. Alvin Borquist, of Clark University, agrees: "Crying is a profound disturbance, a large reaction and no mere shedding of tears," he writes in the American Journal of Psychology. "It is the end of a cumulative development of a feeling, brought on by a condition requiring an effort out of all proportion to the power of the organism. Whatever else a cry is, it's a cessation of the state of strained effort."

Dr. Frederick H. Lund, of Temple University, writing in the Journal of Social Psychology, says, "The common element in all occasions for lachrymation is a pleasant, or at least alleviating, stimulus."

But why is it only women who respond to a release of tension by "lachrymation"? Physiologically, there seems to be no reason why men should not cry as often as women. And in some cultures they do. Doctor Borquist gathered much data from the Bureau of American Ethnology and from missionaries to primitive peoples. He tells of tribes in the Pacific among whom men cry openly and as frequently as women—even the fierce Maori tribesmen weep unashamedly. He points out, too, that American Indian warriors did not find it "unmanly" to sob at the death of their friends. And in ancient times strong men cried openly: Achilles was no weakling, but Homer writes of him, "To the shore of the old sea he betook himself alone and cast forth upon the purple sea his wet eyes." In the Bible, David cried at the death of Absalom, and Abraham wept when Sarah died. Joseph cried on meeting Benjamin. At the death of Lazarus, "Jesus wept."

But American men of the '40's cry far less than women. They do so for two reasons: (1) open tears are no longer allowed men by the stern code of our day; and (2) modern women cry much oftener than honest emotion alone demands.

Take the first problem. Dr. C. C. Burlingame, of the Institute of Living, of Hartford, Connecticut, has described the suppression of tears among men as "a sad matter of mores." Little boys are trained, from the earliest years, to hold back their display of emotion. John

On this much, doctors are agreed: there's no such thing as idle tears.

IF YOU ASK ME

By Eleanor Roosevelt

★ Is it true that your husband, the late President Roosevelt, never wrote his own speeches?

No. My husband wrote a great many speeches in his own hand. When he became President, however, he developed a regular routine. First of all he decided on the subject with which he was going to deal, then he called in the Government officials charged with the responsibility for the work on this particular subject: for instance, if it was to be a fiscal speech, the Treasury Department and the Federal Reserve Board were consulted; if agriculture, the Department of Agriculture and allied agencies, and so on.

After he had all the facts, he usually sat down with two or three people and explained his ideas of what he wished said. They made a first draft and brought it back to him. He then went over it, and sometimes there were as many as six or eight or ten drafts of the same speech. One member of this small group was usually someone adept at phrasing, another was good at cutting, because in any speech which is made over the radio one is apt to put a great deal too much into it to fit the time. In between each rewriting my husband went over it again, and if you ever go to the library at Hyde Park you will see the collection of speeches with corrections on the various copies in my husband's own handwriting.

When a speech was finally written, my husband always practically knew every word that was in it by heart, as he had gone over it so often. It was the final expression of his original thoughts. I have, however, seen my husband take a speech which his advisers thought was completely finished, tear it up and dictate an entirely new speech because he felt it was not simple and clear enough. He retained the facts, but he was particularly adept at putting thoughts into simple and clear enough words so that even I, who might not know anything on the subject, found I could comprehend what he was talking about.

★ In a magazine article I read that you have trained yourself so that you can take short naps when you have a little free time during the day. I have heard of other people being able to do this. Are there any words of instruction or advice that you could give to help another person develop this ability?

I would only suggest that you be so tired that you cannot keep your eyes open. If you are as weary as that and have learned to relax instead of becoming keyed up and tense, you will find that your eyes will close and you will be asleep for a few minutes until some unexpected sound awakens you. It may be for one or three or five minutes, but the principal requirement is that you be very weary, and still able to relax. Don't do it in an automobile, however, unless you pull off the road first!

★ My only child is almost three, and ordinarily I would consider having another in the next year, but I am afraid to bring a baby into this world with its present uncertainties. When I read about the dreadful things that can happen I become actually ill with fear of what our future may be. Have you any advice for me?

Yes. Stop being afraid. Suppose our great-grandmothers had been afraid to leave Virginia, for instance, and journey westward; this country would never have been settled—and they faced as many uncertainties and unknowns as we do today. You will ruin your child of three if you live under a cloud of fear, and you will ruin yourself as a citizen, and your own happiness and that of your family, if you do not learn to face whatever comes with courage. If you haven't got courage, make believe you have it and that will help you to acquire it.

★ A group of us are trying to build up interest in national politics by campaigning for our high-school student council and class officers. I have discussed this with the principal and American-history teacher, and they are in favor of it. Can you give any suggestions on how to get and keep the students' interest? The principal has agreed to let us have assemblies and campus campaigning.

If there is any way in which the problems which you face in your school can be tied up with the questions that are being discussed in your community, state and nation, then I think you will find that in a very painless way you can lead the members of the student body to think about their government. For instance, if you have any racial questions that you face, you can tie them up with the racial questions which we face in the nation. Discrimination can exist in school, and it can be wiped out in school in just the same way that it should be wiped out in the nation. I think if you can get some local speaker to explain to you special subjects that touch your lives, that may help to broaden your interests. For instance, every boy and girl today is touched by the draft, and an understanding of the reasons for military preparation and the hope of peace in the future generation and disarmament among nations could be quite easy to tie up with your school interests.

★ In questions concerning communism, I believe your answers are biased in favor of a totalitarian system which is seeking to destroy our form of government. I am an Episcopalian who is proud of the ancient dignity of a great church. I think of our late President, a fellow Episcopalian, and wonder why he was such an ardent admirer of atheistic Russia and why he did so much to make Russia a powerful state.

I do not know why you should think my answers on communism are biased in favor of any totalitarian system. I am completely opposed to such a system, whether Fascist or communist. The fact that the Russian government, like the Hitler government, imposed atheism on their people for a time does not mean the people of Russia are atheists. In fact, the government has already lifted its ban on the various religions and allows them complete freedom in Russia today. In both cases the effort was made to center the interest in the state rather than in the church. My husband made it one of the conditions in the first agreement with Russia that people be allowed to worship as they desired. However, I do not feel that the Episcopal Church is the only church in the world and I feel that people have a right to make their own decisions as to what they mean by religious freedom.

★ One of my girl friends wanted to meet the boy I go with, or did go with, and so I got her a date with a friend of his. Now she is going with my boy friend and I am left holding the bag. How can I win him back?

If I were you I would not try to win him back. If he can be taken away so easily, I do not think his affection is very deep. I would be inclined to find someone else whom I liked. Perhaps you will find that a new boy is really more attractive than the old one, and I should hope he might have a stronger character.

PORTSMOUTH

New Hampshire

The house above was twenty-one years old in 1779, when John Paul Jones, for whom it is now named, boarded in it while his ship, America, was being fitted out in Portsmouth Harbor. Below, on Middle Street, just off Haymarket Square, from left to right, are the Thompson house, 1808; the brick Larkin house, 1815; the wood Larkin house, 1800; and the Langley Boardman house, 1800—quite a cluster.

THERE are parts of Portsmouth which can cast a spell so powerful that only the great old houses catch the eye, as fresh and bright as ever, seeming to make all signs of contemporary traffic disappear like magic from the sight of the captivated beholder. It would be no more than fair to say, however, that for these pictures, taken from the streets, the absence of traffic was made possible through the kind co-operation of Portsmouth people operating, it would appear, under the same spell with which the various lovely scenes in their city envelop the visitor. As plentiful as these distinguished and time-dispelling vistas are today in Portsmouth, on which in this issue we can only make a start, there would have been many more but for a fire that swept the town in 1813. On the other hand, there would have been many fewer if Portsmouth, somewhat later, like most other early American cities, had been swept by the wave of nineteenth-century industrial prosperity under which so much of the charm and splendor of the past elsewhere all but vanished. For while Portsmouth today hums with activity, its period of fullest bloom was the romantic era of the sailing ships; famous fleets of which from all over the world she not only harbored but built superbly in the yards that lined her Piscataqua River, leading out to the Atlantic a few miles away. Now, of course, her tall, proud sails are gone, but there are mansions of the early mariners and merchants which still stand, as you can see, high and handsome, on her shady streets. ★ BY RICHARD PRATT

No less a connoisseur than George Washington called this the handsomest house in Portsmouth, when on several occasions in 1789 the first President dined here with New Hampshire's first governor, who had built it five years before. And so it has been regarded by many connoisseurs since, displaying, as it does, Colonial elegance in its very best vein.

THE GOVERNOR LANGDON HOUSE

The carving of the mantel and cornice of the little south drawing room tells of the skill and taste of the local early ships' carpenters. The spinet

The large drawing room was most appropriate, both in size and splendor, for great receptions; in fact, the fleurs-de-lis were carved on the keystones of the arches to commemorate the visit of Louis Philippe, who later became King of France.

The original dining room, of which this is a replica, now graces a near-by hotel, but the corner cupboards contain the same china that was used by celebrities like Washington and various visiting royalty from abroad.

ed niche in the elaborately carved and papered dining room holds a hite sideboard; the chairs are Chippendale, the table an unusu- Duncan Phyfe. The silver and the mirror are early American; the fruit cake plate on the table are Staffordshire; and the rug is Chinese.

The principal bedroom is papered in a Colonial Chinese pattern; the four-poster is Chippendale; the magnificent cherry chest-on-chest is early American; the chairs are Hitchcocks; and the English tilt-top table stands on an early American hooked rug of about 1825. Beyond is the beautiful upstairs hall with its broad view of the river.

THE MOFFATT-LADD HOUSE

From the ship room on the second floor of his stately mansion, Captain Moffatt could look down upon his wharves below the bluff in front of the house and watch his ships sailing out the Piscataqua, bound for the four corners of the globe. The low building to the right is the office where his shipping affairs were conducted, affairs of much more magnitude than the size of the office would indicate, to have enabled him to build and maintain his home in such splendid style. Still owned by his descendants, the house has been placed in charge of the New Hampshire Society of the Colonial Dames, who have furnished it in the fashion to which it was accustomed.

ably the most spacious and impressive hallway in New England, with one of the most beautiful staircases, the walls are covered rare old Bay of Naples paper. The English gate-leg table antedates the house, the chair is Jacobean, the sofa Hepplewhite.

"Oh, all right. I guess somebody got to take care of ya," Jimmie said; adding gently, "but ya better act right. Ya don't get to be no delink like me, understand?"

The Stinker and the Delink

THE monotony of the afternoon was dissipated when Mrs. O'Leary brought a new kid into the boys' dormitory. The fellows turned from the windows to look and the craps game at Fats' cot ended suddenly. Jimmie looked up from his comic book without much interest. He saw that the kid was just another "stinker" who would stay in the Children's Shelter only a few days until reluctant relatives or the orphanage claimed him. He looked about seven or eight, but was so skinny he might be older.

"Now boys," Mrs. O'Leary said hopelessly, "this is Dave, come to stay with us. I want you to leave him alone." There was resignation in her voice, as though this was something she had to say. She knew what would happen the moment the door closed behind her.

Fats and some of his "delinks" advanced toward Mrs. O'Leary and the kid, smiling and nudging one another. A new stinker on a dull afternoon was a welcome diversion for the delinquents.

"We'll take awful good care of him, Mrs. O'Leary," Fats said sweetly. It brought a flush of helpless rage to the matron's plump face.

"Fats, I'm warnin' ye," she exploded. "Ye're an incorrigible divil an' will be till the Lord takes ye. Leave the poor boy alone. He has had a bad time and should be in a hospital, but they never have room for our kids. His aunt kicked him into the street, may the Lord and Judge Palmer punish her."

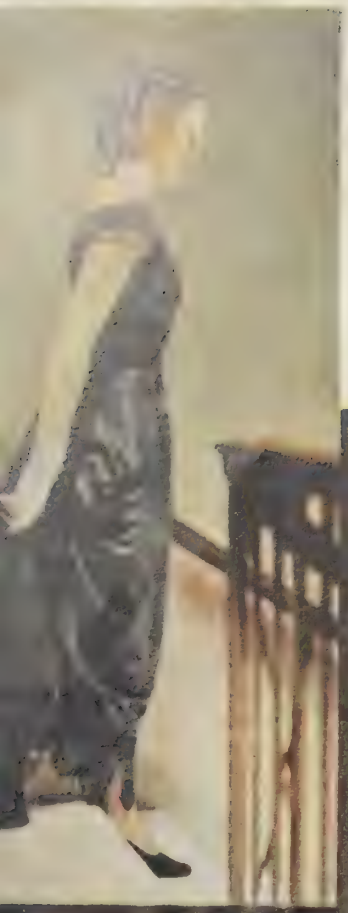
"My, my, ain't that terrible?" Fats said, and he turned to wink to the other delinks. There was strangled laughter as they shuffled up closer. Fats always put on a good show.

Jimmie watched, his unblinking blue eyes flicking over the group near the door. He had lived with an aunt too. But she didn't kick him out. She just never paid any attention to him. He examined the kid with faint interest. He realized this stinker wasn't even bawling.

Usually they came in streaming tears and they cowered against Mrs. O'Leary while their frightened eyes darted all around. This Dave was almighty scared, but he wasn't crying. He just shook. He stood up straight alongside Mrs. O'Leary and his eyes were wide open and tearless. But his teeth hit one another and every once in a while his shoulders would draw up and he'd shudder with a quick intake of breath. He reminded Jimmie of a puppy he had found in a gutter once, crowded up against the curbstone, shaking and whimpering as the automobile wheels ran close to him. But he snarled when Jimmie picked him up out of the gutter. He was paralyzed by fright, but he snarled.

Mrs. O'Leary sighed and patted the boy's head. "You tell me if anybody bothers you, Davey," she said hopelessly again. She knew and everybody in the Shelter knew that a stinker who stooled might just as well be moved out before he was carried out.

She hesitated at the door, but gave up and left. Fats didn't move. He waved the other delinks back. He knew Mrs. O'Leary would listen at the door and if she heard any fuss would slam back into the dormitory with a broom handle for all the delinks she could reach.



"We wanna make you happy here like the probation officers say," Fats announced loudly for Mrs. O'Leary's benefit. "Whyncha come here an' meet the guys? They'll love ya like a brudder."

She wears the new, and the old. Her winter coat was inspired by a famous designer's original, made by her own tailor. Her black taffeta evening dress came from an antique shop, cost a dollar. She's an individualist, with an artist's eye for color and design. She has always worn "longer" skirts, unexaggerated shoulders, slim-toed pumps with baby French heels, Victorian jewelry. Long before the present fashion she had fringed wool scarfs in pink and gold. She loves full skirts, always works in a black cotton dirndl. She collects sweaters, hand-knit in Washington, Connecticut, where she and her family spend week ends on their farm. ★

A fur coat should be the love, the luxury and the long-lived mainstay of a winter wardrobe. It should have a future, and when it is discarded at last, you should be able to say, "That was a wonderful coat and it gave me my money's worth." The new coats follow and predict the fashion. They have shoulders easily sloped or lightly padded, simpler sleeves, smaller collars, slimmer lines. There is the look of not too much coat. Modified back fullness falls slimly from the shoulder blades or flares slightly in an inverted box pleat, from collar to hem. The fitted coat returns and a fitted or flowing silhouette is accomplished with a drawstring waistline. Linings are gay—taffeta or colorful wools. Bright scarfs are knotted under a turned-up collar. The sleeve is pushed up, sweater fashion, for an important glove. The small jewel-toned hat is the right one. Many furs are "in fashion," at many prices. For beauty, long life, adaptability and a price range, we are citing: sealskin in natural, black, brown and the new navy blue (in seal-dyed muskrat); Persian lamb; soft, luxurious-looking beaver-dyed sheared raccoon. ★ BY RUTH MARY PACKARD

The Draft will

Success of our new army depends more upon civilians than soldiers. The peacetime draft is too important to be left entirely to the military.

BY HENRY F. PRINGLE

DESPITE the grim headlines, despite the friction and the bickering, no foreign power actually threatens the United States. No sane person today believes, in sharp contrast to the summer of 1940, when Hitler raged across Europe, that war is inevitable. Nonetheless. for the first time in American peacetime history, the nation's young men are being drafted into the armed services. Trouble lies ahead, potentially serious trouble, unless an alert and informed public—not to mention the new soldiers themselves—fully understands the reasons which made selective service necessary. Resentment and bitterness will surely spread among the men unless the Army, in which most of them will serve, radically changes its old-time training methods.

Congress authorized the draft because energetic and costly drives for volunteers had failed. They failed largely because of the inescapable fact that Americans as a whole have no taste for military life. They will, of course, fight for their country when danger threatens, as they have demonstrated again and again. But they detest Army regimentation and discipline. They object to the caste systems in the armed services. As a result the Army could not enlist enough men to maintain our occupation forces in Germany and Japan or to insure a minimum defense establishment in the United States.

The first small contingents of selectees have already left their homes. By next July a quarter of a million youths will, whether they like it or not, have put on the uniform of their country. An additional 150,000 eighteen-year-olds will have qualified for a shorter service period by volunteering.

About a year ago this writer was asked by the editors of the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL to examine the proposal for universal military training then under debate in Congress. The resulting article endorsed the plan and found much of value in the Army's widely publicized model training unit at Fort Knox, Kentucky. This article is an explanation of the extremely important differences between universal training, as then envisaged, and the provisions of the Selective Service Act of 1948. I shall also show that neither the military training nor the living conditions will be anything like as good as they were at Fort Knox.

To get an exact picture I have talked with the highest ranking officers in the services, with chaplains, with camp commanders and with the men who will train the selectees. I have discussed the draft with members of the so-called Compton Committee, the civilian group of distinguished Americans which carefully studied the subject and then recommended universal military training last year. And I talked, too, with many of the eighteen-year-old boys who have volunteered in large numbers because their term of full-time service was thereby cut from twenty-one months to a year.

Few, if any, of the selectees will be assigned to the Navy and the Air Force, which expect to fill their quotas with volunteers. These two are the glamour services, in contrast to the dull, but essential, hard-working Army. So the subject centers on the Department of the Army. And that huge organization, having demanded the draft because all calls for volunteers failed to provide enough men, now finds itself on a very particular spot. The Army has not remotely enough officers properly to train the men being inducted, and small prospect of getting them for a year at best, since they cannot be drafted. It has not enough doctors, dentists or nurses. Only limited funds are available for repairing the training centers, some of which are in deplorable shape, which will be used for the selectees.

Nobody can doubt the integrity and ability of Gen. Omar N. Bradley, Chief of Staff. He was forced to urge selective service. But the Army wasn't ready for the draft. It could not be, for lack of funds. General Bradley is fully aware of the difficulties which lie ahead.

"All I can hope for is patience," he told me. "The public was patient with me when I had to take on the Veterans Administration. They gave me time."

More than patience must be contributed by the American people. They must be skeptical of Army management. They must be vigilant. Otherwise disgruntled selectees as well as men waiting to be called will demand an end of the draft. Congress will surely listen, as witness its clamor to bring the boys home after V-J Day, and hundreds of millions of dollars will have been wasted. Congress can terminate selective service any minute that it chooses by a joint resolution of both houses.

Selective service will most certainly be a colossal failure, as officer after officer admitted to me in private, without the active support of the American public. And this means the organization of committees of the most important and influential citizens in the cities and towns near the training camps. Such committees must do much more than supply off-duty recreation for the men, vital as that is. They must keep a watchful eye on the camps and their operation to make sure that abuses do not arise. Other committees everywhere must maintain alert observation of the local draft boards to insure absolute fairness.

The Army made a mistake, as things worked out, in turning so bright a spotlight on Fort Knox. Mothers or their sons who expect to find the training camps now being used much like that experimental unit will be sadly disappointed. Gen. Jacob L. Devers, Chief of the Army Field Forces, has said that as many as possible of the Fort Knox procedures will be used. But he added that "every soldier has as his primary duty the obligation to fight." The Army added that "luxury is out of the question." In short, life in the ranks will be tough.

Of course the selectees must be trained to fight. Obviously, luxuries are not to be expected. Fort Knox, the Army's show place for what it hoped to do under universal military training, was close to being luxurious. A War Department report on the experiment referred to the typical Fort Knox officer as "the father of his men." I asked a chaplain friend of mine whether this was an accurate description of officer-soldier relationships in our expanding Army. He laughed.

"It wasn't true in many cases even at Knox," he said. "Don't forget that an Army officer is like anybody else. He doesn't intend to spend twenty-four hours a day with his men. He wants to get his work finished, get back to his family or have a drink."

The overworked officer in today's Army will not have time to be a stepfather. At Knox 75 officers and 482 enlisted men took care of the welfare and training of the unit of 664 soldiers; in effect, five teachers for every six men. The Army will regard itself as fortunate if it can find one instructor for every three selectees, and this includes cooks and other service troops. Energetic efforts are being made to obtain 26,000 more officers, mainly of company- and platoon-commander grades, and some success has been achieved. Former G. I.'s with combat records are being encouraged to accept commissions as second lieutenants. The number of Officers' Candidate Schools has been increased. A stream of able young men will soon be graduated annually from college training courses.

Getting enough officers in time is uphill work. For one thing, the pay scales are low. The Army cannot compete with business and the professions in these booming days. By July, 1949, the Army will need a commissioned personnel of 105,000, including doctors, dentists and nurses. It now has about 70,000. But during the year some 12,000 will resign or die, so a total of 47,000 must be recruited if the Army is to be properly led, taught and cared for. World War II provided a reservoir of 300,000 reserve officers. Questioned by registered mail, however, only 21,000 answered that they would consider returning to active duty. More than 60,000 did not bother to reply to the questionnaire. In desperation, the Army has raised the age limit for company-grade officers from fifty to sixty.

On top of all this is the safe assumption that officers of the regular Army will pull every possible wire to avoid participation in the training program. Several of the cantonments are in isolated areas in the South. Housing conditions are at least as bad as during the war. In a secret report in the Department of the Army's files are photographs of some of the shacks in which Uncle Sam's "officers and gentlemen" are currently living. One looked like the log cabin of a sharecropper. Others lacked proper water and toilet facilities.

"If I were ordered to active duty at some of those camps," a young major at the Pentagon said, "I'd have to resign from the Army. I really believe my wife would leave me rather than have the children live in some hovel at a remote Southern cantonment. She did it during the war because she had to, and endured the bad schools and the other conditions. But right or wrong, she doesn't feel the compulsion now."

So what is Johnny to expect when his local draft board calls his name and he starts to camp? Conditions will improve as the months pass, of course. They must. If he is among the first thousands to be enrolled, however, Johnny is likely to find conditions fairly rugged. At one cantonment, for instance, the Army lacked adequate guards after the war. Consequently, pipes have been ripped out, toilets stolen and window sashes removed. The fans which operated the heating systems are also missing. Fairly extensive repairs are needed at other camps before they meet World War II standards.

When Johnny is tapped for service he will first be sent to a near-by recruiting station for a preliminary interview and a physical examination. He will have little or no choice in the branch to which he is assigned. After a brief interval he will be shipped out to one of eight training stations: Fort Ord, California; Fort Jackson, South Carolina; Fort Dix, New Jersey; Fort Knox, Kentucky; Fort Riley, Kansas; Camp Chaffee, Arkansas; Camp Breckenridge, Kentucky; Camp Pickett, Virginia. The Army promises to do its best to train selectees at the post nearest to their homes, but this carries no guaranty that they will not be shifted after eight weeks of basic training. Indeed, a transfer is virtually certain. All the new soldiers, except the eighteen-year-old volunteers, can be sent overseas.

Johnny, as he probably already suspects, will find life in the Army regimented, often physically exhausting and sometimes dull. He will be badgered by noncommissioned officers (Continued on Page 166)

When the Woodgrain Dry

WAS IT REALLY A LIE—OR JUST THE PROMISE OF WHAT MIGHT HAVE BEEN? ★ BY GLADYS TABER

MISS MINERVA MARTIN had been teaching voice at the college for more years than anyone could remember. She had simply been there since time began, weathering as the gray stone walls weathered under the insistent ivy. Presumably she was young once, and she must have had some kind of training, but in the early days when she came to Buckley requirements were extremely fluid. She made references to study in Paris and Berlin and Milan, but possibly she had only been to the opera in Milan and never sung there. In any case, it was years and years ago.

She had only one real claim to glory. She had, in her narrow dark room at the top of the curlicues in Main Hall, a framed portrait of Hilda Larsen as a young girl; and whenever she had an opportunity, she told about being Hilda Larsen's friend and teacher before Hilda left the confines of Snowshoe, Minnesota, and went on to "singing like a reincarnation of Jenny Lind," as the critics said.

She never really came right out with a flat statement, but it was pretty clear that she had discovered Hilda. Hilda had a good voice, she did admit, and after some work on tone placement—"just the kind of work I want you to do, Cora Lee ——"

The portrait was of a young, thin Swedish girl with a ribbon around her hair, and a white shirtwaist and skirt. It was faded a little. It hung over the flat-topped student desk and was the only decoration in the room except for a china vase of dusty pampas grass which someone had once sent Miss Minerva from Florida.

On the desk a scrapbook of newspaper clippings was generally open. The clippings were of two kinds: clippings about Hilda Larsen; and clippings about student recitals at college. Nobody but Cora Lee had ever looked through the book, but she reported to her roommate that there wasn't a single clipping about Miss Minerva herself.

The furniture in the room, besides the desk, consisted of a single iron bed, a tan wicker armchair, a dark walnut-stained dresser, a cloudy mirror, a straight chair with a leatherette seat. The rug was dark brown. The walls were painted by the college every few years, always (Continued on Page 149)

Cora Lee sang. Outside, the laundry boy put down the basket of sheets and leaned against the ivied wall, listening. Three girls on their way to the gym stopped too.

Chair covers pick up colors in the rug, violet and blue-green. Pink curtains are used in summer, rose-red in winter. Old china has flowers too.

FOR centuries women have been making things with their hands, and passing on to their children the secret of their skills in needlepoint, quilting, fine sewing or one of the various branches of embroidery. "Handmade" is a label that inspires respect.

A needlepoint rug is an ambitious project, but one that may well become a family heirloom, to be treasured and handed down from generation to generation.

The rug in the picture measures approximately 9′ x 12′. The pattern is of French derivation in the traditional millefleurs design which dates back to the fifteenth century, but suits well with American or English traditional furniture. It is composed of scattered flower motifs in a variety of pastel tones—rose, violet, blue and green—on a soft, cream-colored background, and it has a 12-inch-wide border of blue-green with graceful white, bell-shaped flowers.

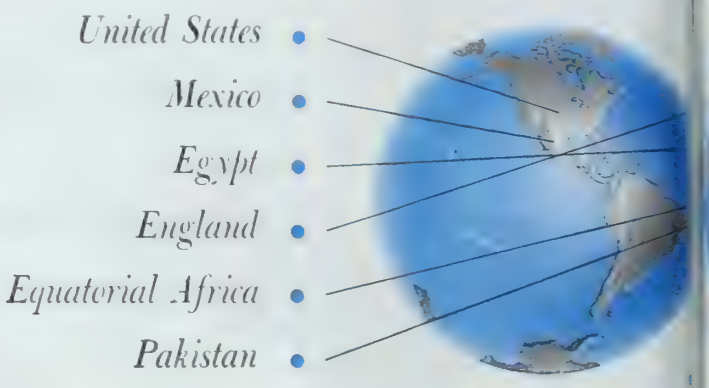
Since the rug is composed of a series of separate 20″ x 20″ squares, fewer squares will produce a smaller rug. There are six different designs, which you can mix at your pleasure. The average worker can finish a square in about two weeks. The stitch used is gros point, a large fill-in stitch worked in needlepoint wool applied to a mesh canvas with a size 20 tapestry needle. Leading stores throughout the country will be able to supply complete kits of each square, with easy-to-understand directions and the wool yarn.

If you do not wish to attempt a room-size rug, combine 6 squares for a hearthrug . . . or try a hall runner, a footstool cover or chair seat in the same motif as the rug . . . ideas suggested in the sketches on page 106. If you do not find the materials for this rug in your local store, write to the JOURNAL for the name of a store in your area where they will be obtainable. BY H. T. WILLIAMS

PEOPLE ARE PEOPLE THE WORLD OVER

PAKISTAN: In the family of Mohamed Usman none can read and write. Sumar (shaved head), the eldest son, will probably never go to school. His only education comes from the Koran in the mosque. His father is satisfied; school might spoil the boy for farm work.

FRANCE: Bertrand Redouin (center) attends a one-room school located in the town hall of Fossés. M. Redouin, whose schooling was confined to the seven years required in France before 1936, hopes to send his boys on to secondary school and agricultural college.



ITALY: Class dismissed, the children of Greve, Italy, pack away their books and papers to return home. Mario Guercini (at door) waits for his cousin Loreno (standing, left). Owing to the teacher shortage, classes meet only half a day, three or four times a week.

UNITED STATES: Bruce, Arleen and Richard Pratt swing in the playground of the consolidated school they attend at Glidden, Iowa. Arleen, now in fourth grade, wants to be a farmer's wife. The boys want to farm like father. The Pratts, unlike most American farmers, are both college graduates.

MEXICO: The Gonzalez boys tag in the yard of their pri school, named for Mex third president, Francisc

THIS IS THE WAY

ON autumn mornings the school bell rings around the world. In Japan, it brings the Okamoto girls, Kikuko and Utako, on foot across the rice paddies, carrying their books in canvas bags. In England, Peter Hiatt rides his bicycle down to the corner; there the Hook Norton school bus picks him up. In Mexico, the Gonzalez boys go early, to play in the schoolyard until teacher calls. Soon the last little feet are quiet under the school desks, and the children's day has begun.

The children of our twelve countries are learning to read in eleven different languages and write with six different alphabets, but arithmetic is the same everywhere. Bruce Pratt, who is on long division, can easily sympathize with Peter Balogh, who is on multiplication tables, and Bertrand Redouin, who has fractions.

Beyond the basic three R's, the most common subjects are history and geography. The school which the el Gamel boys attend in Egypt teaches agriculture. The Okamoto children learn gardening, music and sketching; the Pratts, elementary science, music and physical training. The children of Mohamed Usman, in Pakistan, will study the Koran, but probably little else. English is taught in both the German and the Japanese schools and Russian in the Czech school the Baloghs attend. Subjects may differ, ENGLAND: This is Peter Hiatt's arithmetic class in the Hook Norton village school. The school-leaving age is now 15 in England, but the Hiatts want Peter to continue right on with secondary school until he is 17 or 18. Peter cannot easily get home for lunch, so he has it with his grandmother.

CHINA: Although education theoretically compulsory, ab all the schooling the Ho dren will get in chaotic Ch cio Madero. In Mexico, e out of five adults are il- ate, but a literacy cam- n is making rapid progress.

EGYPT: In the courtyard of the village school, the el Gamel boys play a Nile Valley version of shinny. They start school at the age of seven, will continue until twelve, when they quit to help with the crops. They learn to read and write Arabic, and to memorize certain passages from the Koran.

THE WORLD STUDIES

but the world's classmates are united in the pursuit of knowledge—and passing grades. Times are tough for teachers. In Greve, Italy, there is one woman teacher for the entire school, so she divides her pupils, taking half in the morning, half in the afternoon. In Wollau, Germany, the classrooms are crowded, and the Stieglitz children will go to school an extra year to make up for war-lost time. In Equatorial Africa, missionary teachers never know what to count on, for there is no compulsory attendance. In the United States it is said that teachers are overworked and underpaid.

The conquest of ignorance is a world-wide battle in which every skirmish is fought uphill. Schooling is suspect in Pakistan and in China, where four fifths of the people cannot read and write. The five sons and two daughters of these families will in all probability never go to school; their parents need them in the fields. And their parents need them because they themselves have not had sufficient education to modernize their farms. This is the vicious circle. To break it requires the energetic courage shown by M. Redouin, in France. He will not let his children touch the farm chores if they have homework to do. He is determined that his children shall have an even better education than did he, to enable them to live as free men in a free world.

what is handed down from her to son. Father Ho can ad and write, will teach the ildren if he can find the time.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA: Peter Balogh struggles with his arithmetic in the village school while his patient teacher looks on. Caught in the linguistic scramble of Central Europe, Peter will probably learn both Czech and Russian in addition to his native Slovakian. Chances are he will leave school at 14.

PHOTOGRAPHS for the Journal by Horace Bristol (Japan and China), Larry Burrows (England), Robert Capa (United States and Czechoslovakia), Marie Hansen (Italy), George Rodger (Egypt, Pakistan and Equatorial Africa), Phil Schultz (Mexico), David Seymour (France and Germany).

EQUATORIAL AFRICA: The sand serves as a slate for Agoyu Zamba (left foreground) when she studies arithmetic at the missionary school in Lujulu. She will also learn to read and write in the Bari language, and study the Bible. The school term is indefinite.

GERMANY: The classrooms of Germany are crowded now, and there are more than 65 pupils in this class to which Richard Stieglitz belongs. The boys are seated on one side, the girls on the other, to prevent the pulling of pigtails and to preserve traditional discipline.

JAPAN: The Okamoto children attend a huge consolidated school which has 2000 pupils. Here the girls, Kikuko and Utako (right), read aloud for their history teacher. They go barefoot inside the school, to keep the floors clean. The teacher gets $18 a month.

Judge Abbey and the Four Elves

BY CECILY TEAGUE CROWE

ILLUSTRATED BY COBY WHITMORE

IT has to do with four elves and a very old man and Christmas Eve, but it is not a tale of fantasy or even of whimsey. It is the story of a village crisis and modern psychology cunningly applied, and the human witnesses to its truth number two or three hundred. These are the townspeople of Stillbrook, New Hampshire, and this particular Christmas Eve was a recent one, even though the folks in Stillbrook are already making a legend of it.

It is necessary to begin with Dr. William Gates. He was new to Stillbrook that winter, with everything to recommend him: he was young, tall, good-looking, with a far more impressive medical education than was thought necessary in the old days, and a good war record. He was kind. He would answer an urgent summons in the middle of the night in any weather without resentment, or at least without expressing it, because he had become a physician for the simple, old-fashioned reason that in his heart there was a deep sympathy for his fellow men.

But he was not old-fashioned enough for his fellow men of Stillbrook, New Hampshire, because young Doctor Gates naturally leaned toward the psychological approach in medicine, and this the townsfolk put in the same class with sex education, socialism, and quick-freeze lockers—they were modern inventions which Stillbrook managed to get along perfectly well without.

Judge Abbey, for example, was quite harmless, and their rule was to leave him alone; they wouldn't have dreamed of subjecting the old man to a dose of psychiatry. But Dr. Bill Gates did, and what had provided the town with amusement for many years Doctor Gates treated with the utmost gravity.

That was another thing about Doctor Gates. He was friendly and he had a quiet sense of humor which made his gray eyes flicker, but the townsfolk felt he took himself and his profession too seriously; he wasn't the kind of physician they called "Hi, doc!" to.

There was the morning, for instance, when the schoolboys lay in wait to snowball him when he emerged to start his house calls. "Either his dignity will be injured and he'll give the kids what for," the neighbors said, "or he'll be a sport and pelt 'em right back. Let's watch." But Doctor Gates dusted himself off and grinned and said, "That's fine. I like to see the aggressive instinct come out in the young—it's so free of inhibitions." And with his eyes mildly flickering he passed on down the walk unmolested.

He was, in fact, the kind of doctor the townsfolk took their ailments to, but not their troubles; they liked him, but they had their reservations. That is, up until that most memorable Christmas Eve.

"You'd think," the judge exploded, "they'd have the decency to let a man alone at a time like this."

It was Mary who had the faith — and Bill who was supposed to work the miracle

LADIES, HERE IS THE

Getting your man is one thing. Understanding him is quite a different matter. ★ By Marguerite Barze

DOES the man you love often puzzle you? Do you sometimes think, "If only I could figure him out"?

That is what we have done for you here, and given you the key to his heart. One man is like a cold drink on a hot day, another like a hot drink on a cold day. This quiz should help you in understanding all kinds of men, and in choosing the one who would be most congenial for you.

Dr. David Seabury, who has spent over thirty years in the study of human nature, has resolved human beings into twelve basic types.* These types are presented here as Tom, Dick, Harry and so on. Their patterns are cut out with words, and no matter how unusual an individual is, he is cut according to one of the twelve basic patterns.

So get your John or Don to answer these four groups of questions, to determine the type of man he is. Each question to which he answers Yes counts 2; if the answer is 50–50, count 1; if the answer is No, count 0.

GROUP 1

	Yes	50-50	No
1. Do you like to be manager of things and people? . . .	☐	☐	☐

7. Are you quick about making decisions?	☑	☐	☐
8. Does life seem highly dramatic to you?	☐	☐	☑
9. Are you frequently the leader in things?	☐	☑	☐

GROUP 2

1. Have you a deep desire to help humanity?	☐	☐	☑
2. Do you dearly love children?	☐	☑	☐
3. Are you inclined to go by intuition more than facts? .	☐	☐	☑
4. Are you warm and tender-hearted by nature?	☑	☐	☐

6. Are you good at explaining and teaching?	☐	☑	☐
7. Have you a strong urge to do creative work?	☑	☐	☐
8. Are you genial and friendly, a good mixer? . .	☑	☐	☐
9. Is love the greatest thing in life to you?	☑	☐	☐

GROUP 3

1. Are you a conservative, conventional person? . . .	☐	☐	☐

GROUP 4

1. Are you eager to study and learn?	☐	☐	☐

6. Do you like to do research work?	☐	☐	☑
7. Is it easy for you to concentrate?	☐	☐	☑
8. Do you like to figure out all sides to a question? . . .	☑	☐	☐
9. Do you often feel reverence, awe, wonder?	☑	☐	☐

Now add up his scores in each group separately, and set them down as per example:

Group 1	Group 2	Group 3	Group 4
15	13	10	16

To find his key number, put down the number of the group in which he has the highest score (in this case 4) and beside it put the number of the group in which he has the second highest score (in this case 1). The key number to the above example is 41.

In case of a tie in group scores, go over the questions carefully and break the tie. If you find this difficult, consider the scope of the questions in each group as a whole and decide which one he belongs in first and which one secad. The way he answered the first ques- on in each group is a good indicator: a es answer would settle a tie in favor of at group, over one in which the an- wer was 50–50 or No.

If you would like to determine which ype man is best for you, answer the uestions yourself. A person who has he same key as yours, or whose key has he same first number as yours, is your rst choice. One whose second number s the same as your first, or vice versa, is our second choice, while similar sec- nd numbers is third choice. Without imilar key numbers your chances of ompatibility are dubious.

TOM 12

TOM is a banker. He moves about in is comfortable sphere with serene de- isiveness and diplomacy, and does his work with confidence and ease. Luxury- loving and with a horror of financial de- pendence, he calmly and consistently strives for the security which money and power can bestow. Keen of intellect, steady of purpose, he ponders well on all life's investments, his feet on the ground and romance in his heart. To some he appears conceited, for he is self-assured and self-sufficient and has a tendency to dominate others, but he is really more humble than egoistic.

Tom loves people in groups and greets everyone with outgoing affection, but he feels social and unsocial by turns. He has a marked sense of humor and in a crowd he laughs and clowns as if he had never a care or a heartache. But alone or, with some one person he reveals the strange sad strain of melancholy that underlies the gaiety. Tom is something of a stoic with an outwardly placid, childlike simplicity of nature. But he easily becomes indignant over injustices to society and tries to correct them. No one will do more for you, but he will not be coerced. He needs to feel that he has command over things—indeed, possession is nine tenths of his law, self-possession the tenth. It is loving that keeps him smooth and at his best.

To his wife, Tom seems both gentle and willful, both sweet and passionate. He has a high code of honor and his fidelity is absolute. He is interested in her every word and act, every wish and need. He longs to be loved for himself alone, just as he is, and he yields so completely that he dominates by yielding. His intensely loving, domestic nature gives all he is and has without reserve and wants all in return.

Key. Tom's disposition ever swings from gaiety to sadness, though he hides the sadness from many. In realizing this, one can help him over the melancholy periods quietly. Tom's wife should be ready to take his style of life as their pattern, for he finds it hard to adjust to change and the unfamiliar. When he gets stubborn and turns his will power into won't power, you would break your heart, not his will, in trying to budge him by force. Argue little and leave blame out of it, for Tom finds it hard to forgive and forget. Also, being self-sacrificing, he has a martyr strain in his make-up. But if you love him with all the strength and passion of your being, and just as he is, you will give him a feeling of peace and security which will change him greatly by subtle influence, and you will get security and all-embracing love in return.

DICK is a lawyer; his mind is as nimble as a flea. His body, like his mind, is always on the go, agile and volatile. His elastic personality stretches over a wide territory and springs back from every sally with buoyancy and wit, or sarcasm. For Dick is ingenious and effusive; the first-person pronoun begins many of his interesting sentences and he is a forceful speaker. He is a stickler for facts, a perpetual student, and has a flair for journalism.

Dick is a ready mixer and has lots of friends but few intimates. He seems so peculiarly adapted to people that he is often consulted and confided in, often quoted and copied. His quick wit and lithe body make him a good showman and he finds life dramatic. He even appreciates tragedy when it is his own, but may find yours a nuisance. For he quickly becomes impatient, irritable, given to nervous foot tapping. This makes him a poor nurse, for he can't sit sit still long enough to wait for you to get well. Nor would he commit a murder—he takes his hatreds out in talk, and he talks better than he listens.

Dick's wife finds him responsive to her ideas, co-operative with her plans and a wonderful (Continued on Page 234)

Wait for Spring

THERE IS ONE WAY TO OPEN ANY WOMAN'S HEART ★ BY ADELE S. OSHERSON

ILLUSTRATED BY ALEX ROSS

IT was just before dawn and the room had taken on a still, blue quality. The windows were faintly, eerily luminous. Jane stirred and turned heavily in the broad double bed. She woke slowly, conscious of a dim beginning of pain: a deep, niggling awareness. For a moment she did not respond. During the past nine months she had become accustomed to various strange aches and symptoms that were apt to vanish as erratically as they appeared.

The pain prodded at her and she opened her eyes, now fully awake. There was still over a week left, but Doctor Christie had said that first babies often came early. Her heart began to pound, so strongly that she thought the throbbing would surely waken Todd. He was sleeping soundly in the center of the bed, the blankets wadded firmly around his shoulders. Jane climbed carefully out of bed and went down the hall to the bathroom.

She glanced at herself in the mirror of the medicine cabinet, squinting in the glare. Her face had the puffy, sallow look that had come to her lately, and her brown-blond hair was lank and stringy. Oh, I hope it's today, she thought wretchedly. But the hope had no sooner formed than she snatched it back, terrified.

Without warning the pain returned, like a cat turned suddenly tiger. She felt her breath going out and sat down abruptly on the rim of the bathtub. It grew stronger, viciously, and she held onto the washstand, her fingers digging futilely into the cold porcelain. When it was over she took a long, shaken breath. Time that had dragged so sullenly the past three quarters of the year had spun itself out in a flash.

"Janie?" Todd was blinking in the doorway. "Are you all right?" She saw the warm sleepiness drain from his face. "Is it—is it ——"

"I think so," she said, flexing her cold fingers.

"I'll call Doctor Christie."

She listened to him hurry down the hall to the phone. It seemed foolish to sit there, so she went out to the living room and sat down, her hands clasped tensely in her lap. Could this really be happening to her? For as long as she could remember she had been afraid of childbirth. She looked back over well-trodden ground, knowing it was fruitless, but unable to face the hours which lay just ahead.

The discussions had begun so calmly, almost scientifically. Of course she wanted a baby, she had said, only not right now, not right away. But Todd had been unexpectedly stubborn: five years could hardly be called right away, and when did she think they ought to consider it? The discussions had degenerated into quarrels and then, somehow, they were always bickering. She had held out obstinately until fear had transcended shame and she admitted she was afraid. Todd listened. And laughed. He had gathered her up as though she were five years old and afraid of the dark. "But every woman is afraid," he had said, smoothing her hair with his large, heavy hand. "They're scared to death, probably, but they have their babies just the same." It was the first time she had found no solace in him. The very fact that Todd wanted a baby was an admission that his life was incomplete, that she was not enough. She felt a sickening sense of betrayal. It was useless to tell herself that a baby would spoil things and "change everything." Everything was already changed, whether she ever had a baby or not. The quarreling had left a sore spot. She wanted him to be happy again. She wanted to be happy with him. And nine months was such a long time—surely long enough to get adjusted to the idea. . . . But it hadn't been. She was still afraid.

"He says he doesn't think so," Todd reported, "but to get over to the hospital anyway, just in case."

The word terrified her. A vast, involuntary shuddering began inside her and she could feel her teeth beginning to chatter.

Todd hovered over her. "How do you feel?" he asked worriedly.

Resentment and fear hardened her heart and she would not look at him. Now he is afraid for me, she thought bitterly. Now, when it's too late.

"I'm all right," she said stiffly. But her need was greater than his and she wished she could rest against him and feel his arms around her. She sat still, afraid to ask for comfort because it might snap the last trembling shred of her self-control. "I'd better get ready."

She dressed slowly. Whatever happened now, it was out of her hands. She had done her part, she had played fair; resting, taking long walks, watching her diet.

ROUGH WILD, VAGUE DREAMS HIS VOICE REACHED HER. "LISTEN. THERE'S SOMETHING WRONG WITH THE BABY."

Brown October Days

BY ANN BATCHELDER

WHEN the last of September comes, I give up. It is the end of summer and that's that. I think of it as one who has taken off her bustle and let down her hair and passed the beauty of the world along to October. And October in all her glory is ready to spellbind you with everything she has.

May I call your attention to the cold nights, the brilliant sunny days, the air that is like wine and the promise of unknown things to come. Better make the most of it—it will not always last. Those paths in the woods, carpeted with purple and gold already, wait for you to come.

Auctions raise their lovely heads. As far as I'm concerned, I am going to my last auction of the year. I didn't get much done in that line this summer, but if the weather holds out as I think it will, I'll be away on a high hill where I know that certain things I must have await some bidding. I don't mind sharing some of my secrets, so if you should look hard for me, I believe you'd find me up on Craftsbury Common. There is no world beyond this spot, But guarding it forever and forever are two immortal sentinels: Mansfield, the austere, the mountain of mountains, and Camel's Hump, the fun maker among the mountains.

I wish that I were there today. It is so still on Craftsbury, so safe near Mansfield, and it is very beautiful beside the Camel's Hump. A winding road will take me home, with Eden only a stone's throw as the crow flies.

Now to our cooking. But before my plans take me too far from home, I must get into the realities of our October menu. And a fine layout we have too. The cool days call for hot food and the appetite relisheth the same. Notice that word "relisheth"? I didn't coin it. But when I got to the end of "relish," it just seemed the natural thing to say.

Now I shall tell you what a chicken-corn soup is about. It has all the simple elegance of a Paris frock, but you'll like this little number as a six-year-old girl likes her first plaid dress with silver buttons up the front. Do you know such a little girl with such a worldly dress? Good, for I do too.

1 Now the hunter returns from the hills. The painted woods are still with leaf. Summer is over and fall is here. It is October. Almost every good thing is to hand right now.

2 To me the Hubbard squash has charm. I'd like to meet that gardener Hubbard. Or has he gone where squashes are no more? This squash has to be cooked right, not just boiled. My favorite way is baked, then mashed, with cream and butter.

3 All kinds of things can happen to a rarebit. Melt what you need of good, soft, sharp cheese, add thin cream, seasonings and a cup of cooked finnan haddie, flaked fine. At the last, stir in a beaten egg. Serve hot on toast.

4 Remember how folks used to despise dandelions? Now everyone seems to have canned them. So to a dandelion winter. Good with that ham bone.

5 All the crushed and broken potato chips you find in the bottom of the can or have left after a party make a fine crisp crust for "breading" croquettes.

6 A news item that's ready now for the tea tables when the fire's aglow and gossip is handed round with the Staffordshire. Just tiny, thin gingersnaps, than which nothing is more wonderful with tea or coffee. They melt away fast, either plain or spread and put together with cream cheese or orange marmalade.

7 The bridge tables are bumping into place, ready for the winter campaign. Here's what will make good alibiers of you all. And post-mortem artists too. Split English muffins, nice fresh ones—don't cut them. Toast to a golden brown. Spread with butter or margarine and keep hot on a hot platter while——

8 You put a large spoonful of chicken salad on each half and cover with grated American cheese. The broiler will take care of the rest of this matter. When cheese is melted and all is hot, here's the dish for your bridge supper. Of course, fruit and coffee go along. Don't want the girls looking at the kitchen door—or is that all right?

9 Or if your bridge club specializes in chicken salads—chop some walnuts rather coarsely, toast them in the oven and add to your chicken salad just before serving. Your salad will be different.

10 You can keep them all guessing with this one. Cook small potatoes in canned bouillon (or meat stock, if ~~you have any~~). Cool, slice or dice and fry. No one ever tasted fried potatoes quite as good as these. Don't forget the salt and pepper.

11 Another new note for an old dish. Add a little prepared mustard to your creamed codfish and serve on noodles instead of potatoes.

12 Steamed cauliflower flowerets are as dainty as peach buds and almost as tender. Drain them and cool. Dip each one in beaten egg, then roll in fine crumbs and fry on both sides in butter or margarine. Sprinkle with salt and Parmesan cheese and serve hot.

13 Another variation of the cauliflower theme: Dip the cauliflowerets in cream sauce. Roll in mixture of grated cheese and bread crumbs, half and half. Put in a shallow pan and broil until tinged with brown. Good with a slice of broiled ham or broiled pork chops. Put the cauliflowerets under the broiler last, as they take only a few minutes.

14 Ever eat a green-pepper salad? Slice the peppers lengthwise, take out the seeds and sauté the slices in hot salad oil until they're tender. Now drain them. Chill and toss them in French dressing with tiny inside lettuce leaves. This is wonderful with fish.

15 The shad-roe supper seems to suit. Split and broil as many canned roes as you need. When they are done, spread them with butter or margarine and dust well with salt and pepper. And remember the lemon. Serve on a platter with alternate stuffed tomatoes and green peppers. As neat a little number as you'll find for many a long day.

16 Well, since I've been thinking of the good old-fashioned October dishes, I might as well keep on. Mix two cups of codfish-cake mixture, the homemade kind, with two cups of lobster cut fine, the whole seasoned well. Bind with yolk of egg—probably need two. Beat all together and shape into fingers or cakes or croquettes—little ones. Fry in shallow salt-pork fat or give them the regular deep-sea frying.

17 The time to cook spaghetti or macaroni is now. Make a rich sauce with mushroom soup—and that's the sauce for many things. Add some sautéed mushrooms, sliced, and some very imperceptible slivers of cold ham and tongue.

18 Now generously baptize this grand sauce with Gruyère and Parmesan cheese. Drain the spaghetti or macaroni and pour over it the sauce, boiling hot, tossing it with two forks that all may get coated. Appeal for Sunday night—maybe?

19 For party time want something new? Here it is from me to you. Involved in this matter is a very ripe avocado, one that, peeled, will go through a sieve like butter. Mixed up in the affair is one cream cheese which is beaten right in with the pear so you can't tell one from t'other. (There's more to this.)

20 Now season well with salt and pepper, with onion and garlic salt, and keep atasting. Add a little Worcestershire, a very little mustard. (Careful here, of course.) Beat very hard. Taste at the last. It may need more salt. Set in a bowl of ice to serve. This should be eaten on crackers or potato chips. Dunking's the thing—dunk and eat. Can't be beat.

21 Another little specialty from our garden of hope is made by having at hand plenty of hot toast, spread with butter and Roquefort cheese mixed, seasoned with a sprinkle of cayenne and run under the broiler for a minute or two. This is expendable—replenishable—and you'd better take it in your stride.

22 Herb note: There are things under the sun that are always new. Herbs for pointing up flavors are one. Take stuffed eggs: season the mashed yolk mixture with a combination of sage (how I love it!) and marjoram—not too much of each. Just enough, as the girl said of the eight-carat diamond.

23 You've tried everything else, now try this on your breakfast grapefruit. Put two apricot halves in the center of each and pour a little apricot sirup over the grapefruit.

24 Are you one of those horrified people who shudder at cream in French dressing? Well, take about four tablespoons of soft, ripe Roquefort cheese. Note the "soft," the "ripe." Now work this cheese in with four lavish tablespoons of heavy cream. Add the cheese-and-cream mixture to a generous cup of fine French dressing which has been man-handled plenty, beat some more and toss with your green salad.

25 From an old cookbook: "Now is the dreaded season of the oyster. May I say that only long, hard cooking will destroy the oyster's waywardness, yet there are people who eat them raw. Pray, desist." Or bring on a coupla dozen for me—right in the shell.

26 Potato surprise: Bake potatoes as usual, whip up the potato with cream, butter, seasonings—all as usual. But as you fill the shells, tuck an oyster into the center of each half. Brown in the oven as usual.

27 A good appetizer: Tiny puff-paste shells filled with one oyster in cream sauce.

28 If you overestimated your waffle eaters' appetites and have an extra waffle left over, cut it in strips. Spread generously with butter, then with cinnamon and sugar. Run under the broiler. Good with tea.

29 This is not an old New England custom, but it's good. Add one half cup of pitted dates cut into pieces to your custard mixture. Pour into unbaked shell. Bake the same as custard pie without a date.

30 I saw a man at a party take a large spoon of chutney, the kind that has all the works in it, and apply it to a slice of buttered toast. Over that he spread a good helping of Welsh rarebit. That man had an idea. Try it.

31 This is a glorious month—make the most of it. Soon the winter warnings will be set.

THE SKEPTIC

Mountains may turn pink or blue;
I never saw them so.
Nor do I now recall the tops
With tons and tons of snow.

This disbelief and many more
Are part of my upbringing.
That's why I walk a glory way
And keep on singing.

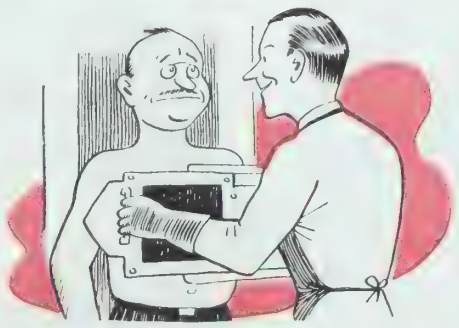
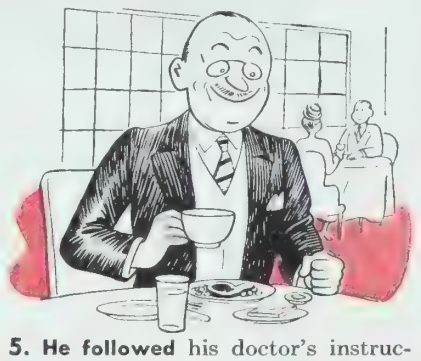
MEET A MAN WITH

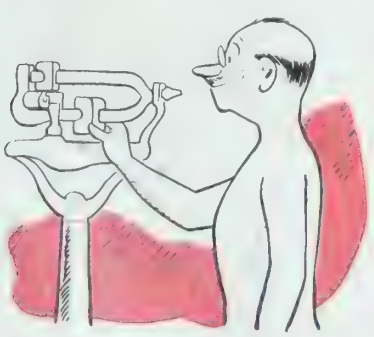


HIGH BLOOD PRESSURE

1. Everybody has blood pressure. It goes up every time your heart beats, down when it rests. The doctor discovered the level of this man's blood pressure stayed high most of the time. He had high blood pressure (hypertension).



2. His heart had to work harder to circulate his blood. This strain often enlarges the heart muscle. Arteries, brain and kidneys may also be affected.



3. However, after a medical examination, this man learned that like most high blood pressure patients today, he could do a lot to help himself.

4. By taking his doctor's advice, he learned how to live with his ailment, to slow down at work and play, to get plenty of sleep and rest.

5. He followed his doctor's instructions about diet, so that his food might help his condition, and avoid putting an extra burden on his heart.

6. He brought his weight down to normal and kept it there. For blood pressure often rises and falls as weight goes up and down.

7. He sees his doctor for frequent checkups. Under good medical care and with sensible living habits, he can look forward to many happy years.

There is hope that advances of medical science will provide new means of combating high blood pressure. Many continuing studies are being aided by the Life Insurance Medical Research Fund, supported by 148 Life Insurance Companies, which makes grants for special research in diseases of the heart and arteries, including high blood pressure.

"Yes?"

"After the play, will you speak a few words to us from the stage?"

Doctor Liang hesitated.

"Please! It will honor us."

Doctor Liang was gracious. "Very well—but you will have to translate for me."

"Honored!" Billy Pan exclaimed with fervor.

Doctor Liang's mind was on the gaudy scene upon the stage. In his secret heart he did not enjoy the strutting, declaiming actors, the brightly ancient costumes. This sort of thing might be all very well for a country audience in China, but would he be ashamed if he brought his classes here? He could always tell them that in Shanghai as well as in Peking there was a drama as modern as Broadway.

Then it occurred to him that not only the play was difficult. The audience was even more so. Children pattered back and forth and women talked whenever the action dulled for a moment on the stage. It was most unfortunate, he thought, that Chinese like himself were not the sole representatives of his country. It was a great pity that Chinatown had ever been made.

The clamor of drums and flutes and violins grew loud and the crowd was suddenly silent. The star was coming on. She stalked up and down the stage brandishing the little whip which meant she was on horseback, singing in a high falsetto as she went. From the timbre of the voice Doctor Liang knew that Mu Lan was being played by a young man, but the people were naïvely ready to imagine that she was a beautiful, strong young woman.

I might explain the motif by saying Mu Lan is our version of Joan of Arc, Doctor Liang thought.

He was pleased with the idea and his mind played about it. Before he knew it the curtain went down, the hard neon lights flashed on, and Billy Pan stood on the stage waving his arms for attention. People who had been getting up sat down again, and babies began to wail and were hushed. A flood of rapid, explosive Cantonese burst from Billy Pan, none of which Doctor Liang could understand. When everyone turned to stare at him, however, he knew that he was being introduced and walked with dignity up the aisle to the stage. He stood with his hands clasped and bowed to the audience. Then he began to speak, waiting at the end of each sentence for Billy Pan to translate.

It was one of his less important speeches, but the audience was easy to please and laughed easily and quickly. He was warmed by their pride in him and he took the opportunity to remark that it was the duty of every Chinese to represent his country in the most favorable light to Americans, who were, after all, only foreigners. As for himself, he said, he was careful always to behave as though he were, in his own small way, of course, an ambassador.

He closed with a reference to Confucius, bowed again, smiled, and walked down the steps. Billy Pan followed and, pushing aside the people, led Doctor Liang out to the street and bawled to a passing taxicab.

"Thank you, a hundred thanks," he said with fervor. "Come again! Please let me know next time and have dinner with Please! Thank you—thank you ——" was still bowing when Doctor Liang shut door firmly and turned to the cab driver

"Riverside Drive," he said distinctly.

From the darkness of the cab he lo out at Chinatown. The people were g home from the theater, shuffling along streets. When did they sleep? Shops were also homes were still lighted and yo men lounged upon the counters and yo girls in twos and threes chattered along sidewalk. It was a lively place, and becau was crude and cheap it was worse alm Doctor Liang thought, than what Americ liked to believe it was, a place of myst and evil. Families lived together closely, parents struggled to keep to the standard a country the young had never seen.

He suddenly thought of his eldest s James, and he sighed. He was profoun proud of this brilliant boy, the child who so easily stood at the head of his classes school and now at the head of the list graduates in the m ical college.

"A great mi Doctor Liang," chancellor had s only a few days a "A great mind a skillful hands—wh a surgeon he make!"

And now Jam wanted to waste his education and back to China!

The cab slowe "Whereabouts Rive side Drive?" t driver asked.

"Two blocks, a then one to the righ please."

The streets we quiet with midnigh There was a moon an it shone down on th river. Just ahead w the George Washin ton Bridge, silvere with light. It was scene familiar wit twenty years of living but Doctor Liang a ways felt its beauty There was nothin more beautiful in th world, perhaps, unless it was the Marc Polo Bridge in Peking. But he did not wan to be in Peking.

"Here you are," the cabby said.

Doctor Liang counted out the exac amount, added five per cent to it, and en tered the apartment house where he lived He was tired and he felt confused and old James was very confusing. The elevato mounted rapidly to the tenth floor and h stepped out. The door to his apartment opened and his wife stood there.

"I have been expecting you for an hour." He could see by the slightly dazed look on her plump face that she had been asleep on the couch, and her Chinese robe was wrinkled.

"Are the children asleep?" he asked.

"An hour ago," she said, trying to be brisk. "Sit down and rest yourself. I have kept some soup hot."

She went into the kitchen and brought out a bowl of soup and a spoon on a tray, and a plate of crackers. He crumbled the crackers into the soup and began to eat.

"I would have been back earlier except that I was recognized and the crowd would have me address them."

"Yes, well ——" she said without interest and yawned again.

A crude woman, he thought with distaste, and he did not speak for a while as he ate.

Mrs. Liang sat on a stool and watched him, her eyes bleary with sleep. She per-

Would She Were Weaker

By Catherine Haydon Jacobs

Would she were weaker! She would know
This folly by its name.
Hers is the steady breath to blow
A yielding candle flame
Either to black oblivion or to a flaming pyre
Until all rays of light forgo
Their heritage of fire.

She called upon her strength to vow
Perpetual release
From the uncertainties which now
Are startled by caprice.
Would she were weaker, for her strength is impotent, alas:
The hurricane that splits the bough Lies light upon the grass.

ceived simply that he was not pleased with her and she tried to make amends. "It was good of you to speak to those small people," she said. "And I am glad you were not at home. That James of ours did nothing but talk about going back to China. You must get a good night's sleep—he is going to talk with you in the morning."

"I shall put him off," Doctor Liang declared. But he knew that James was not a man to be put off even by his own father. He caught sight of Mrs. Liang's mouth wide open in another yawn and he was suddenly angry. "Come—come," he cried, "get yourself to bed—spare me the sight of you!"

He stalked out of the room and turned out the light at the door. In the darkness she pattered after him humbly, and forgave him. He was a great man, and he was her husband.

Doctor Liang prided himself on his calm. Reared upon Confucian ethics in his early home in China, he had for many years comforted himself for his somewhat arid life in New York by teaching Chinese philosophy in the college. There, he hoped, crude young Americans might imbibe from him the spiritual nourishment which he liked to think had kept China intact for four thousand years.

He summoned all his calm the next morning as he faced his son James. The young man, twenty-six years old and last month graduated from a medical college, loved and feared his father, and it had taken all his strength to decide that the day had come to tell him finally that he wanted to go back to China.

Doctor Liang sat quietly in the large brown leather chair where he had written so many of his scholarly works. He was a tall man, and he took pleasure in hearing Americans exclaim, "But I thought Chinese were always short!" This cry gave him the opportunity to explain how unfortunate it was for his people that so many of the Chinese in America were tradesmen from one small region in the province of Kwangtung. The real Chinese were tall, in the north, or fairly tall as in central China, and their skin was not dark. He himself was not fond of exercise and never allowed himself to get sunburned. His sons burned as red-brown as any American, for they were good at sports and played tennis brilliantly. He did not encourage his daughters to enlarge their muscles by such activities. Louise, the youngest one, disobeyed him frequently, but he liked to think that Mary, who was next to James, was a true Chinese daughter, obedient and mild and very pretty.

He contemplated his son from behind his spectacles. The lenses were so thick that they magnified his eyes slightly and added force to his gaze.

"It seems unwise to return home at this time," he said. "The communists are threatening, and as my son your life can scarcely be safe. I would of course commend you to my friends in the government, but they could not guarantee your safety from rebellious students who might revenge themselves on me by killing you."

"I do not want to be under the protection of anyone," James said. "I would just go."

"But where?" Doctor Liang asked sharply. "Where can you go in China today and not waste yourself?"

James did not answer. He sat motionless, gazing at his father, and Doctor Liang saw more strongly than ever the son's resemblance to his mother. Mrs. Liang was a good wife and an exemplary mother. She managed the household well, in spite of imperfect English which she would not improve, but she was stubborn.

"Your education has cost me a great deal of money," Doctor Liang went on. "Fortunately, my books on Chinese philosophy have sold well. But suppose they had not?"

James smiled. "I cannot imagine it, father."

Doctor Liang examined his son's square, handsome face. Was this remark made with

"There is no hospital in China which is up the standard to which you have been ined."

"It has been twenty years since you lived ere, father."

"How do you propose to make your liv- g?" Doctor Liang asked almost harshly.

"You need not send me anything, father," mes said.

"Of course I must. I won't have my son ing about like a beggar."

"Do you mean I may go?"

"I do not!" Doctor Liang exclaimed. On the contrary, I forbid it."

James shifted in the up- ght chair he had chosen. Please don't say that, ther. I don't want to ve to go without your nsent."

The moment which th had dreaded for so any years had suddenly me—the moment of open bellion. Doctor Liang was oud of his elder son and he told himself and s wife many times that James alone justi- d his decision to live abroad. Had they ayed among the wars and confusions of odern China, the boy's extraordinary tal- ts could never have been developed.

There were many other proofs of his wis- m. His children were all well educated, ey had this comfortable and even luxurious me. As for himself, Doctor Liang always id, he felt that heaven had directed his eps, and that he had been useful in ex- aining to Americans the real China. When mes were better again he hoped, he told his merican friends, to return to his own coun- y to spend his old age, and there he would pound to his countrymen the glories of the merican civilization.

"If you disobey me," Doctor Liang said, then I will disown you."

"I shall still be a Liang," James said. "You begot me, and you cannot deny that."

Father and son glared at each other without a sign of yielding. "If I cannot deny it, I will forget it," Doctor Liang said loudly.

Outside the door they heard footsteps retreating softly. Doctor Liang rose and strode across the room and threw open the door. Mrs. Liang stood there, encased in a long gown of dull purple satin. In spite of her many years here she looked as Chinese as the day she had left her father's house thirty years ago to marry a young student whom she had never seen. This morning her hair was smoothed back into a neat bun, and her full, rosy face was kind but strong-tempered.

"Now what is going on here?" she demanded in the loud voice which Doctor Liang detested. Long ago he had learned that the best way to reprove her was by making his own voice especially gentle.

"Our son asks me to allow him to return to our old home." He spoke always in Chinese to his wife, as a reminder that he did not consider her English good enough.

"Let him go, then."

"You do not understand, mother of my sons. His life would not be safe. I have reproved the communists so openly that they will try to kill him."

She sighed loudly at this and plucked from the knot of her hair a gold pin with which she scratched her scalp. "I told you to stick to Confucius," she complained. "Why should you talk about communists? No one wants to hear about them here in America."

Doctor Liang closed his eyes at this stupidity and at the sight of the hairpin. At one end of it was an earpick and at the other a toothpick. He had besought her to throw the implement away, but she had refused. It helped her, she had often declared, to think.

he nodded her head. Putting up her little d, she brushed back the strands of her . straight, black hair which had escaped n the two thick braids wound about her d. "I had to make her see how much it nt to you." She was too delicately kind say that Lili Li, to whom he had been secretly engaged for eight days, might not want to live in China.

"What did she say?"

"She didn't say anything—she just looked at me."

James knew the way that Lili Li could look. Her great dark eyes were like oval gems of onyx set into the smoothness of her soft face. Her lips were full and rested sweetly together. Where other Chinese girls were chattering and restless, in imitation of American girls, Lili was quiet, and every movement was slow and her slender body was rich with repose.

The Li family had come from Shanghai only a year ago. Mr. Li, a prudent man, had years ago sold his silk mills to the Japanese and had deposited his fortune in American banks.

JAMES had fallen in love with Lili at first sight, but she was not easily won. It took months of constant attendance upon her, buttressed by many courtesies from Doctor Liang to Mr. Li and much advice and practical aid from Mrs. Liang to Mrs. Li on the difficulties of finding a proper place to live and on the strange behavior of American servants, before Mr. and Mrs. Li would advise their daughter to yield even slightly to young Doctor Liang's advances.

Mrs. Li became anxious, as she grew familiar with American life on the streets of New York, lest Lili be attacked by American ruffians and robbed of her virtue, or, almost worse, lest some American fall in love with her and want to marry her. She was afraid that she and Mr. Li might not have the courage to refuse their daughter to an ardent and desperate American. Therefore they had made known their complete approval of the Liang family to Lili, and Lili had accepted James.

But she did not wish to let her parents think her the usual old-fashioned obedient Chinese daughter, and so she had told Jim very shyly that she did not want anybody to know at least for a whole week. To this he had agreed, because it gave him time to persuade his father to let him go to China. With that permission he would tell Lili that they would make their home in Peking itself, now that the war was over. The Liang ancestral lands and village were only about a hundred miles south of the city.

He moved restlessly on the bench beside his sister and then got up. "When did you tell Lili?"

"Yesterday. She telephoned to ask me to go to Radio City with her. You know she doesn't dare to go alone anywhere."

They had discussed Lili's fearfulness before, Mary critically and James with defense. "Inevitably Lili was affected by the war, even in Shanghai," he now said.

Mary did not answer. Her heart was full of dreams about the country she had never seen, but to which she belonged, where her own people lived. She could believe nothing but good about China, nothing but what was brave about her people.

"I'm going to see Lili now," James said suddenly.

Mary looked at her watch. It was not yet two o'clock. "Hadn't you better telephone first?" she asked. "She may not be up. You know how Mrs. Li is—she plays mah-jongg all night, and Lili stays up ——"

"I'll go on the chance," he replied. "If Lili is willing, we'll be married right away."

"What if ——" Mary broke off and shook her head.

"What if she isn't willing?" Jim asked. "I'll face that—if I must. So long."

He nodded and walked away, and Mary looked after him thoughtfully. Inside her small neat head her life was planned as carefully as one of the outlines she prepared in her class in child hygiene. She was going to China too. Jim did not know it yet, but she did. Whether he was married or not, she was going. Lili was so helpless, and she could help Lili too.

She watched her brother out of sight, then she rose, shook her skirts out and tripped back to the big apartment house. She had promised Peter to make shrimp flakes; he loved to eat them while he studied at night. To have the radio turned on full blast, to reach out for handfuls of shrimp flakes while he memorized with such ease the laws of physics—this combination of activities satisfied Peter's whole nature.

Mr. and Mrs. Li had found an apartment on the next street in from the river. At the door of this apartment James now pressed a small button, jeweled with luminous glass. He could hear the soft murmur of voices speaking Chinese. At the sound of the bell they stopped. There was silence, and then after a moment Lili herself opened the door.

"Lili," he cried. "I was hoping you were at home."

Her manner, perfectly decorous, softened. She turned her head and called, "Ma, it is only James."

The rooms came to sudden life. Mrs. Li shouted in Chinese, "Come in, come in—we were drinking tea. Ha, you—Lili, what's her name?"

"Mollie," said Lili.

"Mah-lee," Mrs. Li shouted in English, "more watah, velly hot! Teapot!"

A maid with a scared white face hastened in, fetched the teapot and hurried out again. Mrs. Li looked after her with kindly contempt. Then she patted the chair next her.

"Sit down," she told James. "How is your mother? And your learned father, is he working? He works too hard!"

James bowed first to Mr. Li and then to Mrs. Li. "Both my parents are well. And you, sir? And you, madame?"

"He"—Mrs. Li pointed at Mr. Li with a long-nailed thumb—"he coughs a great deal. It is this damp river air."

"I coughed in Shanghai too."

"So you did," Mrs. Li agreed. "It was the damp river air there too. All rivers are alike, full of water, which is damp."

No one could deny this. The maid brought in the teapot and Lili poured tea in silence and handed bowls to everybody prettily with both hands.

It was ill luck indeed, James told himself, that he had found Mr. and Mrs. Li both here. It would not occur to them, he knew, to leave him alone with Lili. However long he stayed, they would continue to sit in amiable conversation. Lili sat gracefully leaning against the back of a green satin chair and looking completely beautiful.

"It is such a nice day," James said helplessly. "I came to see if Lili would take a little walk with me."

Lili looked at her mother and Mrs. Li nodded. "It is bright daylight," she observed. "I see no reason against it."

Lili rose and went to a closet and brou out a small pink silk parasol and a b patent-leather handbag. James bowed farewells.

Out in the street, he scarcely knew ho begin. He knew that Lili would not s until he introduced some subject, and whe he should begin to speak about goin China he did not know. He led her to a b on the river front, and they sat down. leaned the open parasol on the back of bench and it shielded them pleasantly f the street. She looked at the river, but looked at her. He had never kissed her, s ply because he did not know what she w think of it.

"Lili," he said gently.

She turned her long-lashed eyes tow him. The lashes were straight, not curle were the lashes of American girls, and t were very thick. Her lips did not move.

"Will you let me kiss you?" he asked the same gentle voice.

She looked to the right and left. No was near. She opened her bag, took out a pa tissue and wiped the red from her lips. T with an air of patience she put up her fac be kissed. He hesitated, confounded by performance. Then he could not resist ready lips. Her head pressed against his on the back of the bench and she closed eyes. He smelled the gardenia scent of her s

"You don't find it strange—to kiss?"

She took a small mirror and a lipstick fr her handbag and reddened her lips careft and examined her hair. Then she shook head. "Oh, no, James."

Cold horror fell upon him. "You h kissed other men?"

"Only Americans," she said.

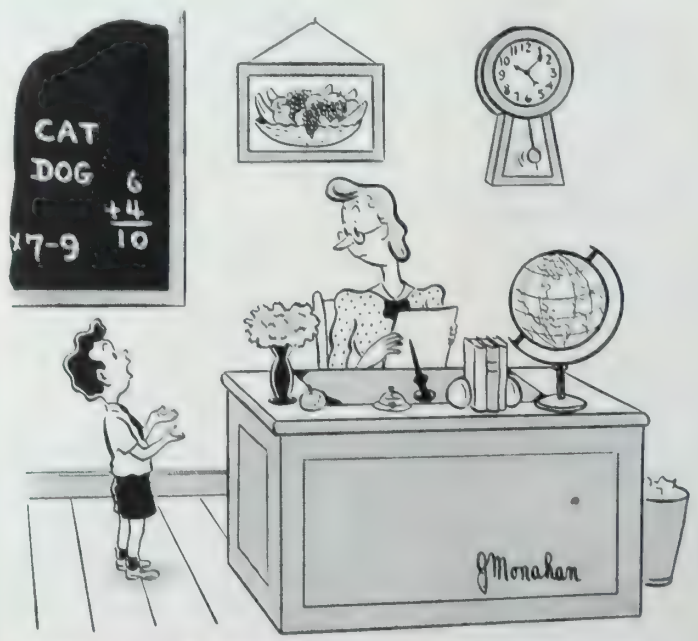
"Americans!" he cried. "But where?"

"In Shanghai. Some soldiers and officers."

"But, Lili, you didn't love them." pressed her hand to his breast.

"No, not at all."

"Then, why, dear?"



"They asked me, and I said why, and th said for good feeling between Americans a Chinese, and so courteously I did."

He laughed loudly at this, and then silen cursed the men who had taken advantage her ignorance. "Please promise me you never kiss any other man but me, Lili. I not right, you know. Only engaged peo and husband and wife should kiss."

She pondered this for a moment. "Th did smell very bad. And I do promise y James. For I do not like to kiss very muc

He laughed, detecting in the corners of long eyes a hint of a sparkle, and he put t delicate scented hand to his lips, and th held it while he talked.

"Lili, now that we are alone, I must tell you what I want more than anything in the world after we are married. I want to go back to China, dear, and do my work there in our own country."

There was not a quiver in the narrow hand he held.

"Are you willing for that, Lili?"

"Oh, yes," she said readily. "If my parents agree."

"Do you think they will agree?"

"Oh, no, I think they will not. We had too much trouble there."

"Then, darling," he exclaimed, "what shall we do?"

She took his hand and suddenly pressed it to her cheek. "Let's stay here," she begged. "Radio City is so nice!"

"But darling, I have work to do."

"You will have a good job," she reminded him.

"But China needs us, dear. Think how few hospitals there are. I want someday to make a big hospital where sick people can come and be healed."

"Chinese people are too poor to pay hospitals," she said.

"But in my hospital the rich will help pay for the poor," he urged.

"Rich people don't want to pay for them," she said shrewdly.

He felt himself caught in some sort of net, so soft as to be intangible, and yet he was floundering in it. "Lili, answer me straight. Will you come to China with me?"

"If my father says so."

"We'll live in Peking," he murmured.

"I like Peking. Such nice shops there."

It was long past noon when he returned home. Mary met him, as silent as a little cat.

"Will she go?" she demanded.

"Yes," James said, "if her father will let her."

"And if he will not?"

"He must," James replied.

"Ha!" Mary cried under her breath.

"Come!" their mother's voice sang at them from the dining room. "Come, eat—the food is hot, don't let the food get cold. Father doesn't like cold food."

"Coming," Mary cried.

Mrs. Liang bustled through the house, calling and compelling. When James and Mary entered the dining room she was hurrying upstairs, her somewhat thick figure toiling its way on half-bound feet. In her childhood her feet had been bound, but when her family discovered that the little boy to whom they had betrothed her years before had grown up into a fastidious and modern young man who swore with ferocity that he would not marry a woman with bound feet, they had hastened to unbind them as far as it was possible.

Doctor Liang looked up as his two elder children came in. "Let us sit down," he told them. "Doubtless Peter and Louise will join us soon."

He began to sup the chicken broth and bean vermicelli with audible satisfaction. Among Americans he would have drunk silently, but with his own family it was a pleasure to relax, he declared, and act as a real Chinese.

No one spoke while he ate. Peter came in and sat down. He was a thin, pleasant-looking boy of seventeen, so thin that his long neck was ludicrous. His features were large and unusually strongly marked, and his forehead was high.

"You were working on some test a few days ago," Dr. Liang said courteously. "I have not heard the outcome."

"I received a mark of ninety-seven, father," Peter said. By concentration he could keep his voice down, and he achieved this sentence without a squawk.

"Good son."

Mrs. Liang bustled in at this moment, sweating apologies. Louise followed, looking sulky. She was fifteen, small and pretty. Her short hair was extravagantly curled and she wore a tight red dress and high-heeled b pumps.

Doctor Liang stared at his youngest c "She has been crying. Why have you sco her?" Louise was his favorite child, and whole family knew it.

"After all you have said about waist b ing"—Mrs. Liang gulped her soup tween sentences—"she was binding waist—that's what she was doing. Before mirror. Her face was all red."

"But why?" Doctor Liang asked, sta at Louise.

"Because why," Mrs. Liang answered a loud voice. "The Americans are wan very small waists."

"We are Chinese," Doctor Liang s mildly. "Never forget, my child. women are beautiful because they are r ural."

"Oh, father, don't worry," Mary cr out. "Louise won't be uncomfortable long, you may be sure of that. She loves to too much."

"Shut up," Louise whispered under breath.

Doctor Liang put down his chopstic Mrs. Liang had served a large bowl of r with vegetables and had set it in front of hi This was his family bowl. When guests w present he used a small bowl—a gentlema bowl, he laughingly explained. Only peasa used large bowls.

"Mary!" he now cried sharply. "Do n be cruel to your younger sister. Louise, not be rude to your elder sister. The fam relationships must be preserved."

"Eh, eh, eat your fo all of you," Mrs. Lia cried impetuously. "Wh your stomachs are full y will feel better. I made t beef and cabbage myse Here, father of n sons ——" She reach across the table with h chopsticks in her right ha and picked a tender bit of beef from the di and put it on Doctor Liang's heap of ric "Now come—the children will all be goo It will rouse your ulcers to be angry with the at mealtime."

Life is thick-sown with thorns, and I know no other remedy but to pass quickly through them.

—VOLTAIRE.

Nothing gave Mrs. Liang a greater sen of success as a wife than the sight of her hu band eating his food with enjoyment. S was irked that her own pleasure was checke by a frame that ran easily to fat, and she w sometimes made melancholy by the sight her husband's spare and graceful body whe he bathed himself.

"I shall have to have a nap," he con plained.

"It will be good for you," she replie "You are not too young to sleep a little i the middle of the day."

Around them their four children ate i silence, dipping into the dishes in the middl of the table. Mrs. Liang did not tolerate th presence of the maid, Nellie, while they at All of them enjoyed their food better whe they dipped for themselves from the middl dishes, but only the children did so in fron of the maid, and not then in the mother' presence.

When the meal was over, Doctor Lian rose, yawned, and went to his room to sleep In the dining room the four young peopl were left alone together.

Mary folded her arms on the table an leaned on them. "Are you going to tell Pete and Louise?"

"What has Jim done now?" Peter asked He was gobbling chocolates, hunting wit his long forefinger for the cream-filled one

"He has asked Lili to go back to China with him as soon as they are married, and she says she will—if her papa lets her." Mary's mischievous voice echoed Lili's soft Chinese pronunciation: "Baba."

"No kidding!" Peter exclaimed.

"I am going too," Mary announced.

The three of them turned on her. "Who said?" Louise cried.

"I say," Mary declared. "I've made up my mind. All this child hygiene—why do you think I've been taking that?"

"So you can be a good mother," Louise said wickedly.

"Oh, shut up!"

Without their parents the four of them were wholly American. Not seeing them, hearing only their voices, none could have heard a difference.

"I think Jim ought to go first and blaze the trail for the rest of us," Peter cried. With excitement his long neck seemed to grow longer.

"How's even Jim going?" Louise asked. "It costs oodles of money."

"I've been offered a job," Jim said slowly.

"Oh, where, Jim?"

"In Peking, in the big hospital there."

"Lucky stiff," Peter muttered.

All of them were sick to get to China, all except Louise, and she dared not say she was not. Alone sometimes she was frightened at the thought of China. She loved America. Her life here was pure fun, mingled with brief hours of work at high school, and away from her family she lived a life which she concealed from them altogether. She was gay and popular, and she danced well and sang as clearly as a Chinese lark. An American boy had fallen in love with her. No one knew except her best friend, Estelle, who was his sister. Romantic Estelle begged them to marry, but Philip had not asked Louise to marry him.

"There's a hitch, though," Jim said soberly. "Lili wants her father to agree to her going."

There was a chorus of snorts at this. "Marry her first," Peter advised, in a manly voice. "When you're married you can do what you like. Be a Chinese for once—make your wife obey you."

Jim smiled at him ruefully and shook his head. "I don't know," he said. "I'm afraid I won't make a very good Chinese husband, Pete."

"Aw, get tough," Peter urged. "Don't let 'em lick you, Jim. Remember you're our pilot."

James looked round at their faces. Peter was eager, Mary was determined, Louise looked remote and dreaming. They were all depending on him, their elder brother, the head of the family after their father. The head of the family! When he was that he'd have them all in China where they belonged.

"You can trust me," he said. "I won't give up."

He was somewhat daunted, however, by Lili's air of resolute calm when she rose with undulant grace to meet him that evening, as he entered the elaborate living room of the Li apartment. She put out her hand and took his and led him to the sofa where she had been sitting. On the sofa opposite, Mr. and Mrs. Li sat with some formality, and their faces were solemn. When he greeted them they inclined their heads and did not speak, and he knew at once that Lili had told them what he had asked. He knew, too, that they had discussed the matter and had decided what their answer would be.

"The night is mild," he announced. "The sky is the color of rain." Because he did not want to speak English tonight he spoke in Mandarin Chinese, native to him but foreign to Mrs. Li's Shanghai-bred tongue. Nevertheless, she answered him in an attempt at the same language.

"The river will grow more damp, and it will be bad for our cough."

James drank a little tea and set down the bowl. "There are many varieties of climate in this large country," he remarked. "Would it not be well for you to travel to the West where the air is dry and there is constant sunshine?"

Mrs. Li shook her head. "We cannot leave New York," she sighed. "It is like Shanghai. And where else can we buy fresh ginger and bamboo shoots? In Chinatown the markets are at least as good as in small towns in our own land."

Lili said nothing. She sat in repose, her exquisite hands crossed on the lap of her apple-green satin robe. She wore a white gardenia in her hair and green jade ear

The scent of the gardenia wrapped fragrant air, and stole into the young heart. He grew impatient with the slow ambles of Chinese courtesy and he cast aside suddenly. Leaning forward, h dressed himself to Mr. Li in English.

"Sir, I think Lili has told you that I asked her to marry me very soon and go me to China. I have come to ask your mission."

Mrs. Li rose immediately. "Come, we shall leave this matter to the two m Lili obeyed, and Mr. Li maintained a silence while they left the room toge When they were gone he rose and wer the door and closed it. He wore tonight nese robes which covered his portly figure gave him great dignity.

"What I am about to say has nothin do with you." His Mandarin was stilted intelligible. Every businessman was c pelled to know Mandarin, wherever his h in China. "I am very willing for you marry Lili. It will be a weight off my m Now you ask me to allow you to take daughter back to the country from whic have escaped. Now, do not mistake m hate this foreign country and I love country. But I tell you, times are very in China. This is why I took the portunity to come to this country and my gall bladder cut out. When I go to operation next month, it would comfort to think my daughter is married safely good young man with a ity, such as you are. T I can die without distre

James broke in. " it is not necessary you to die. I understa these things and ——"

Mr. Li put up his pale, soft hand a stopped him. "You are not cutting me ope he said gently. "Were you holding the kn I would not think of death. If the doct were Chinese they would not expect to paid for killing me, as you know. Th might expect to be sued. But here it see doctors cannot commit murder, whomev they kill. Mr. Li's earnest, soft voice flowed on a on. He spoke very little before his wife a daughter, and when he was alone with a m all this talk came flowing out of him.

James stirred. "Sir, I want to work —— you marry my daughter; it is an old custom with us, you know, when a man has no son." He looked shrewdly at the grave young man who suddenly pressed his lips together, and hurried on. "The surname Li is honorable, my son. It is among the Hundred Names. And your father has another son. I am not robbing him. Now then, everything is clear between us. Certainly I give my permission for the wedding. Say two weeks from today? That gives time for new clothes and the guests to be chosen and so on. It gives me nearly a month before my death. With luck I might even hope that before I die my daughter may conceive." Mr. Li pursed his lips and smiled.

James had no heart to break the old man's dream, and yet it must be done. Trained as a surgeon, he went swiftly to the task. "I do not believe you will die, sir," he said, "and it is better if you do not take it for granted. The mind must help the body to live—we doctors know that. But sir, please do not ask me to change the plan I have made for my life. I am surnamed Liang, and I must remain what I am born. I thank you deeply and I will be to you as a son, whatever my name."

Mr. Li winced at the clear, resolute young voice and James, looking away, saw his fat white hands lying on his knees begin to tremble. He looked away from the hands too, and went on.

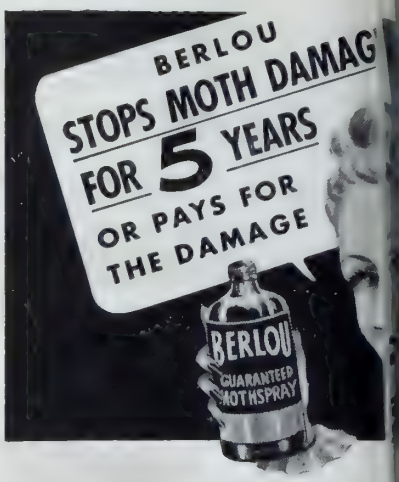
"I am glad that you want Lili and our children to live in our own country. So far we are agreed. We are exiles here, however kind the people. But even that is not why I want to go home. I have some idea—fantastic, perhaps—that I can do some good for my own people."

"But the times are so bad." Mr. Li's voice was a wail.

"I know—and that is why I feel I must go back."

He could not tell Mr. Li what it was that made his purpose hard in his heart. He had never said even to Mary that in some deeply repressed corner of his being he grieved that his own father had chosen to live in exile during the years of their country's hardship. He knew all the arguments, that a scholar could not work in the midst of turmoil and war. But he had long ago determined that he would work where he was most needed. He would not allow his mind to be delicate nor his heart remote.

MR. LI came to the attack again, not harshly or boldly, but with pleading. "Lili has been gently reared. She grew very nervous and ill during the bombing in Shanghai. Perhaps she has not told you how nearly she was killed?"



"No!" James cried in a low voice of horror.

Mr. Li nodded. "She was shopping in Wing On's department store. I had told her she could buy a sable coat. The Russians sent in very good furs to us. She was trying it on when the bomb fell. Luckily she had gone to the stairs, where there was a window, to see the fur by the daylight. Thus she was able to run down the stairs, and escape before the whole building collapsed." Mr. Li sighed. "Unfortunately she threw off the coat, thinking it would be too heavy. Otherwise she would have kept that too."

James did not speak. He continued to look steadfastly at Mr. Li, his face very grave.

Mr. Li went on: "For this reason she is easily frightened, and perhaps will be so all her life. Now maybe Shanghai is better, but we cannot be sure of this. For that reason, even as you say you will not accept our name. I must say that Lili shall not go to China now."

This was Mr. Li's ultimatum, and James knew it. He knew also that by Chinese reasoning, had he been willing to yield and change his surname, Mr. Li might have made compromise and allowed him to take Lili to China. He felt the soft, implacable net of Chinese life spread about his feet, and his heart grew firm. He had lived in freedom and he would not give it up. For a moment even love stepped back and he stood alone. He got up, thrust his hands into his pockets, and stood with squared shoulders.

"I shall be sorry to leave my wife here in America to wait alone until China is fit for her to live in. But my work must come first."

Sweat broke out on Mr. Li's full pale face. "You are too foreign," he said. "With a Chinese, family comes first," he said.

James looked down steadfastly into the upturned face. Mr. Li was a good man, but he had never done China any good. He was one of those who had lived for his own family. To family how often China had been sacrificed, and by how many!

"Whatever I am, I am first myself," he told Mr. Li and he turned and left the room and, walking down the hall, went out of the house.

He could not go home. The night air was soft and the streets were quiet. He glanced at his watch and saw that it was eleven o'clock. There was all night yet to face. He walked slowly, hatless, his hands in his pockets, down the street and across to the river. There the bridge was, the George Washington Bridge. He had grown up with American heroes. George Washington was more living to him than Confucius was, a doer and the creator of a new nation. The bridge stretched across the enormous span of the river. Mists were rising in soft swirls from the chilled water, and the farther end of the bridge was hidden. It reached from the near shore endlessly into the distance, into the future, and his rich imagination made it a symbol. He would cross the bridge of his dreams, even though he walked alone.

Dinner Party for One

By G. M. White

Faces drift in the sheen of cherry wood
Where firelight fashions lace:
She never dines alone who knows
Her heart is a crowded place.

But in the night, alone in his bed, Lili crept out of his heart and into his mind. He lay in the darkness thinking of her, loving her with all the strength of his young repressed manhood. He had grown up among American boys and girls, seeing their horseplay of sex, and not sharing in it. The knowledge that he was not of their race was barrier enough, but the delicacy of his soul was the real barrier. He would marry his own kind and they would glory in being Chinese. His pride was fulfilled in Lili. All his restraints tumbled in the night and he determined that he would not give her up.

When he got up from a restless night he looked fresh and strong with determination. He bathed, he shaved, he dressed himself carefully in his new gray pin-striped suit and he put on a wine-red tie. When he came to the breakfast table only Mary and Peter were there, and Peter was studying while he ate and did not look up. But Mary cried out at the sight of him:

"My, you're handsome this morning! Did baba say yes?"

James grinned and sat down to a bowl of oatmeal. "Baba said no, and I'm going over there this morning to take Lili by force."

"I wish you luck," Mary said. She was suddenly sober, and she whispered under her breath, "Oh, how I wish you luck!"

He pretended he did not hear her while he poured on cream and heaped on sugar.

For a moment when the door opened into the Li apartment he thought that Lili had been forbidden to see him. Mollie, the maid, looked distressed. She shut the door softly and glanced up the stairs.

"They had some sort of row here," she whispered. "When I got in this morning ——" She shook her head.

But Lili herself interrupted them. She came down the stairs, looking exquisite and pale, wearing a red silk gown and little black slippers. Mollie disappeared and James went forward and took Lili in his arms. She crumpled against his shoulder and began to sob softly.

"You made baba so angry."

He was distressed by her weeping, and he led her along in his arm until they were in the small music room off the hall. Here he shut the door and sat down with her on a love seat. "Lili darling, don't cry," he coaxed. He pulled out the fresh new handkerchief he had put into his breast pocket and wiped her eyes, holding her face up by his hand under her chin as though she were a child.

"Baba says I mustn't marry you," she sobbed. "He says he will find me another husband."

James felt his heart knock at his ribs. "He can't do that, darling—not if you don't want him to. If we stick together, no one can force us apart."

"Baba can."

Despair all but overwhelmed him. She was so yielding, so soft, so trained to obedience. What if he could not put strength into her soul?

"Listen to me, darling." He brushed away the soft curls of her hair from her ear. "Try to understand how I feel. China is great. She is not really weak. She is only in distress. All the great strength is simply waiting until we come to her help. She has lived in an old, old world and she needs to be born into the new one. I am a doctor and I think naturally in terms of birth—of bringing forth life ——"

She was looking at him with wide blank eyes. "But if baba won't give us any money how will we live in China?"

He laughed at this. "I will work and make money."

To his shocked surprise she grew angry at this. "You talk only silly!" she exclaimed. "In China you cannot work. There is no money."

"The hospital will pay me."

"A little money," she said scornfully. "How much? Maybe in one month what this gown cost baba. He is right. I cannot."

His arms grew cold around her. "Do you mean you don't want to marry me?"

She wept again loudly and she threw her arms about his neck. "I do—I do—but please, here, in New York, I like it so much!"

He said gravely, "I must go."

His arms dropped and she put them back again. "No, you must love me, please!"

In her distraction she was so beautiful, so helpless that he held her, while his heart broke.

It was she who spoke first after a while. "There is only one way, James. You must go first, without me. When baba lets me, I will come."

"You mean . . . go without being married?"

She nodded. "It is the only way," she said. "Baba will not make me marry another man right away now if I cry every day. Maybe he won't die. Then—after you make money—buy a house maybe, or just even rent a nice house ——" She twisted her little wet handkerchief into knots and then untwisted it, doing everything, he thought, to avoid his eyes.

"This is what you want me to do, is it, Lili?"

"Not what I want," she whispered.

He was very gentle, very tender. "Then, dear, couldn't you come with me—run away, maybe?"

She shook her head positively. "I . . . can't," she said in a small, sweet voice. "Oh, no!"

The ocean was not the river. No bridge could cross it. He stood for hours every day, staring down into the clear green water, foaming into white waves where the prow of the ship clove its way westward. His body ached with loneliness, defrauded of marriage. It seemed to him now that he had left his father's house in a dream of suffering. He had not tried to persuade Lili again and he had seen her only once more, the last night before he went away. It was too late then to change anything, even had there been a change in her. He had sent cables accepting the job at

His little life is in your hands

If he's thin and nervous there's one important thing you can do about it right now !

When we say, "His little life is in your hands", we mean all those things that the heart and mind of a mother can put into the bringing up of a child. But here, in particular, we emphasize the part played by proper nutrition.

If a child is thin and frail or nervous, it may be due to a number of things. But the most common correctable cause is faulty nutrition. And this cause is one which you, the mother, can do something about.

In situations like this, many mothers are now turning to Ovaltine. Because Ovaltine contains a very wide variety and scope of food elements, both common and rare. Particularly those elements that are most apt to be lacking. For Ovaltine is a rich supplementary food that fills in the gaps, the chinks, and the loopholes of an otherwise "good" diet. It contains, for example, the important vitamins A, B_1, C, D, G, Niacin, the valuable minerals Iron, Calcium and Phosphorus, besides high-quality proteins and quick-energy foods.

And when you give two to three glasses of Ovaltine a day, plus normal meals, you can be certain that you have done just about everything you can do to improve your child's nutrition.

A New Flavor

The postwar freeing of many materials has permitted the production of an improved, sweet, chocolate flavored Ovaltine which children really like—an important consideration in getting children to take the nourishment they need.

So, why not give your child Chocolate Flavored Ovaltine every day for 30 or 60 days and carefully note the results. When you consider all the nutritional values it supplies, Ovaltine is inexpensive.

Spry with Cake-Improver gives you a marvelous success secret for feather-light, whisper-soft, richer-tasting cake. And with the easy Spry One-Bowl Method you whisk a cake together in no time at all! And remember—Spry is better than ever for all your baking and frying.

Choc-O-Lantern Cake

2 cups sifted cake flour
1⅓ cups sugar
2½ teaspoons baking powder (tartrate powder, 4 teaspoons)
1 teaspoon salt
½ cup Spry
¾ cup milk
1½ teaspoons vanilla
2 eggs, unbeaten
1 teaspoon grated orange rind
1 ounce chocolate, melted

Sift flour, sugar, baking powder, and salt into mixing bowl. Drop in Spry. Add milk and vanilla and beat 200 strokes (2 minutes by hand or on mixer at low speed). Add eggs and beat 200 strokes. Divide batter in half. Add grated orange rind to one batter and melted chocolate to the other, blending well. Arrange batters, alternately by tablespoonfuls, in 12x8x2-inch Sprycoated pan. Run knife through batters several times both lengthwise and crosswise of pan for a mottled effect. Bake in moderately hot oven (375° F.) 35-45 minutes. Frost cake all over; decorate corners and center with "choc-o-lanterns" (orange sugar patties with "faces" made of melted chocolate). Serve with chocolate ice cream and orange sherbet.

Choc-O-Lantern Frosting

Combine ½ teaspoon grated orange rind and 3 tablespoons orange juice; let stand 10 minutes; strain. Have ready 3 cups sifted confectioners' sugar. Blend 1 tablespoon each Spry and butter. Beat in ½ cup sugar gradually. Add 1½ ounces chocolate, melted. Stir in remaining sugar alternately with orange juice. Add about 3½ tablespoons scalded evaporated milk or light cream and beat well.

pose you pay for my food, some clothes, one bed, then never mind. But better you give me dollars for railway tickets. You go second class, good enough, first class too much. I will buy fourth-class ticket for me and sit by you as servant in second class."

James listened to this arrangement of his life and yielded. "All right, Wang," he said. "Go ahead."

James felt vaguely comforted by this new alliance with young Wang, even though the fellow was only a servant. He needed the comfort a few minutes later. As his eyes hurried over the pages of Mary's careful, neat handwriting he began to grow frightened. "Mr. Li did not die," Mary wrote. "Jim, you mustn't mind. Lili is going everywhere with Ting. Nothing has been announced."

That was all. Ting, the son of a Chinese official in America, was a handsome, gay young student at Yale. James had known him for years, for they had gone to the same prep school. Charlie Ting was an idler and a wastrel. In Chinatown he had to pay cash even though he was an official's son. He had once married secretly an American hat-check girl in the Waldorf and it had cost his father five thousand dollars to make her willing to divorce Charlie.

Mary's letter dropped to the floor and he seized sheets of the coarse hotel paper and his fountain pen and began to pour out his demanding heart to Lili. He wrote for an hour and a half, and then laid down his pen and gathered up the sheets and read them over half-aloud, trying to imagine her face when they reached her. Outside the open window he heard a brawl rise suddenly and end in the dull sound of a thudding club, but he did not get up to see what it was. The city was full of such brawls. There were too many starving people, and policemen treated them as criminals. Perhaps they were. There was no line between starvation and crime. The world, the whole world, was divided into two parts, the island of the rich and the ocean of the poor. He had his feet still on the island. But he was facing the rough, dark waters and Lili, his gentle love, could never follow him. She was a flower whose roots must grow in the loam of plenty. The letter was no use. Either he must go back—or take his reckless leap. He tore the letter into small bits and dropped them into a huge brass cuspidor that stood by the table.

This is not to say that he could forget Lili. That night at the station he sat upon a rail seat that rose out of a sleeping mass of people on the floor, leaning against baskets and bundles, and thought of nothing but her. When he dozed into exhaustion he dreamed of himself successful and famous and som how drawing her to him again. He woke gaze down into young Wang's bland a peaceful face, as he slept back to back with stout old man. Once in two or three hours train whistle blew, and each time your Wang had gone to see whether by any chan the train north was making an unschedul departure. "Sometimes people too man train sneaks away," he explained to Jame The last time he had come back dawn w beginning to break, and outside on the pla form the electric lights were feeble. The was no train in sight, but young Wa peered into the distance. "Train comes," announced in a tense whisper.

"How do you know?" James asked.

"Feel the earth under my feet."

In a quarter of an hour the train pull into the station and the crowd press through the gates and began climbing in doors and windows alike. But young Wa was ahead of them all. Yelling and pushi with sharp elbows, he commandeered tw seats, heaped them with baggage and sat top of them. James, caught like driftwood a wave, heard him roaring at the top of h lungs that his master was a Big Man fro America. When he came into sight, Wa climbed down, smiled, and showed him pleasant enough corner by the window.

"Bags must stay here," he said. "If bags, then seats will be gone soon."

The aisles were full and men and childr sat even in the baggage racks overhead. T noise on the roof meant that those who h not found places inside were on top of t car. The engine gave a series of jerks, peop screamed, a few fell off and the train start northward.

If the day was long and hideous, the nig was less so only because from exhaustion fell into a daze of unconsciousness which w not sleep. He dreamed that he was held some prison full of writhing people who h nothing to do with him and yet he was o of them. He woke to gaze out the dusty wi dows at a dull landscape whose colors he d not see.

On the morning of the second day your Wang broke a windowpane. Fresh cool a rushed in and James felt his brain cle suddenly. He had been sitting in deep d pression, unwashed, for there was no wat on the train. When he had struggled to t lavatory he had found it occupied by tw women, their bedding and three childre and he had retreated again.

The train was many hours late. Long a they should have reached Nanking, and on now were the purple hills looming into vie

At Nanking the train stopped, and they must take a ferry and cross the river to take a northbound train again on the other side.

"You get ready, please," Wang bade James with authority. "Here is one big fight for the ferry first."

When the train slid loudly into the station the baggage was slung about his person like armor and he plunged relentlessly into the crowd, creating a space in which James followed him with a doggedness that was almost as ruthless. By this means they reached the ferry in time to find a place that was not on the edge of the boat.

"Too many people drown," young Wang told James over his shoulder. "Push, push, splash!"

On the northern shore James turned and looked back at Nanking, the capital of his country. It lay hidden behind a high gray wall, centuries old. Beyond it he could see the double crest of Purple Mountain, where Sun Yat-sen's tomb had been built. Someday when he had discovered his own country he would go there and look at the tomb of the man who had lived too long, or died too soon—he did not know which.

When the train reached Peking he was in a fever of weariness. He had been traveling for days and he realized that he had become utterly dependent on young Wang. The sprightly young man had provided him with food and hot tea at intervals, had night and morning fetched him hot water in a tin basin wherewith to wash, had pushed soldiers and women and callous men off the seats he had pre-empted for himself and his master, had fanned away flies, and made life somehow endurable.

A man that should call everything by its right name would hardly pass the streets without being knocked down as a common enemy.
—LORD HALIFAX.

Mary read aloud at the noon meal the letter from James. The family was still in New York, although summer had deepened and Doctor Liang was beginning to feel the heat. He sat delicately languid and listened to the letter, dated two weeks earlier and from Peking.

"I shall not crystallize my impressions," James wrote. "They are too mixed. But I have found this old city reassuring. Even the Japanese respected its ancient beauty. This is not to say that I have seen much of it. I took up my duties the day after I arrived, and when night comes I am too weary to sight-see. My view is also somewhat biased by the fact that I see only sick people. Trachoma is frightful. So is tuberculosis. I operate on the eyes, but can do nothing for the lungs. Ulcers, gangrene ——"

"Spare us, Mary," Doctor Liang said gently. "We are trying to eat—and it is very hot."

Mary folded the letter and put it in her pocket.

"You can read it to me when we are alone," Mrs. Liang said briskly. "Liang, eat some of the beef and peppers. You know you like it."

She dipped her chopsticks into the dish and picked out a bit and laid it on his plate. He ignored it and ate some rice from his bowl, a mouthful or two. Then he began to talk.

"I am happy to hear that Peking is untouched. I hope to spend my old age there, in a quiet lane, in an old house with a garden. I seem to see myself at the head of our family, my children married and living about me under one great roof, in the old style, my grandchildren running about my courts. Ah, happy old age!"

He smiled, and Mrs. Liang, who had been listening with lively interest, broke in. "Liang, I tell you, don't count on it. Children nowadays are unreliable. Suppose they don't want to live under one roof with us?"

Doctor Liang shook his head gently. "I am a reasonably pleasant person, I believe?" He looked at his children's faces with a touching trust. "I am not obnoxious, am I? Not repulsive?"

"Of course not, pa," Louise exclaimed. She was looking very pretty today. Heat flushed her usually pale face and her eyes, set shallowly under flying brows, were dark and humid. She had a secretive reserve except toward her father.

"You will come and live with me, Little Lou?" Doctor Liang went on, half playfully, half pathetically. "Ma, we will have one child with us. We must find a very nice husband for her, some nice young professor, a scholar with whom I can discuss the dreams of Chuang Tzû and the poetry of Li Po, the charming drunkard."

The mention of marriage roused Mrs. Liang's curiosity. "Does James say anything about Lili?"

"Nothing," Mary replied.

"Then he must have heard," Mrs. Liang exclaimed.

"I told him."

Doctor Liang was vexed at this. He spoke with sharpness. "Now, Mary, that was very premature. I was talking with Mr. Li only yesterday and he said that Lili has not made up her mind."

Mrs. Liang sniffed. "Liang, I must tell you. At first I thought it would be very nice to enjoy some money from the Li family. Your salary as a professor is not large, and at present your writing is not very useful to us. But now I don't like this Lili. I think she would divorce James quickly when she likes. I suggest rather a better type of girl, who is more faithful, someone like Sonia Pan."

Peter groaned loudly. "Sonia Pan! She's cross-eyed."

Mrs. Liang would not yield. "Eyes can be fixed now. It is not like before. And she is very good. She does not waste money."

"It would be no use for her to waste money on herself," Louise murmured. "She is too ugly."

Doctor Liang coughed. "I am sure ma is right. Sonia is a very good girl. But the Pan family is not quite ——"

Mary interposed. "Father, I think it is no use to talk of Sonia when James has never thought of her."

"Quite right, my dear," Doctor Liang said gratefully. "Let us think of something else. What do you say to a little vacation for all of us? I am feeling the heat. Sometimes I wish we could move to the country to live."

"It would be too inconvenient," Mrs. Liang said. "You would be lonely, Liang. And it is too hard to buy the food for you. When you feel like country you can always go to Central Park."

She rose and began to collect the dishes. But as always her heart relented toward her husband. It would be no great expense to go to some small place in the mountains to the north. She pattered back into the living room to tell him so. But he was asleep, stretched out on the long sofa, breathing deeply and calmly. She mounted the stairs slowly to find Mary and then she felt sleepy also and yawned. The house was very quiet. The children must have gone out. The letter from James could wait.

On a bench by the river, Mary, Peter and Louise discussed this first long letter. By it they would judge whether China was what they hoped it was or feared it was not. On the whole, the letter was favorable. The journey northward, James wrote, was something to experience rather than talk about. He was inclined sometimes to think that the worst they had heard from Chinese who had fled to New York was not bad enough. Filth and poverty were everywhere. The train was something that could not be imagined and the callousness to death had frightened him. Yet when James had reached Peking, it was like stepping back into New York. The hospital was very fine and luxurious, built by Americans with American money. The Japanese had left it alone, or very nearly, and the equipment, while not of the latest, was still good. The view from his windows was superb. The city roofs were delicately shaped and old courtyards were rich with ancient trees. Everything had been built with the outlook of centuries in the past and centuries yet to come. It made him proud to be a Chinese. The Marco Polo Bridge he had gone to see, because their father had told him it was even more beautiful than the George Washington Bridge. It was impossible to compare them, though. This bridge in Peking was made of marble and stone and there were sculptured lions on it. The mounting curve was matchless.

Peking, James wrote, made him want to send for them all. He was very happy. Something deep in his soul was being satisfied. He worked hard, but he did not tire as he had in New York. Nobody hurried and yet more work was done, he believed, than he had ever seen done before. People moved at an even, steady pace, their minds at ease. They seemed ready for any fate, sturdy and self-confident.

"It sounds like heaven," Mary said, and her eyes dreamed.

Neither Peter nor Louise answered.

She read on: "I know that if Lili saw this place she would be willing to come to me. Houses are not hard to find. We could live very happily—she would not need to work." Mary stopped here. What James commissioned her to do was only for her eyes.

But Peter gave a yelp. He rose and straightened the fold in his trousers carefully. "Tell Jim he is way back in the past so far as that young woman is concerned. She's been tentatively engaged to three men since she was tentatively engaged to him."

"Don't talk so," Mary said.

"Ting told me. Ting says he is going to his dad to put pressure on old Li. It's only way to pin Lili down."

"What pressure?" Mary asked.

"Ting says old Li was really a collabo tor, and his dad has the proof. He skipp out just in time to avoid getting put in ja or coughing up a couple of million to put certain outstretched hands."

Both girls stared at him. "Really?" Lou murmured.

"Tell Jim unless he can put on pressu he had just better forget the whole busines Peter set his straw hat at an angle. "'E kids. I promised Ting to meet him. We going to run out to the beach with a couple girls."

His sisters watched him thoughtfully as sauntered to the street.

"Do you think we ought to tell moth what he does?"

"She can't do anything," Mary said. "I needs to go away. I wish Jim would send f him."

"Peter doesn't know enough to be of an use anywhere." Louise yawned. "I'm goin home to sleep—Estelle wants me to go to dance with them tonight."

"Where?"

"Some roof or other," Louise answered i differently. She hid from her shrewd elde sister the excitement of her heart. Tonigh she would dance with Philip. Estelle wa making it a party of four.

midwives, and in one of the adjoining counties, more than 90 per cent. Home delivery by a doctor, or nurse-midwife, like those trained by the Frontier Nursing Service, who care for the most inaccessible families in this region, is an acceptable and safe procedure. But some untrained midwives, working under unsanitary conditions in dark and drafty mountain cabins, wait too long to assist a patient in labor or try to induce birth by the most unhygienic and agonizing of methods. The death rate of mothers and babies under such treatment is understandably high.

The Oneida delivery room in action is in striking contrast. The room is flooded with light from overhead fluorescent tubes. Gleaming equipment reflects in the surf-green tile walls. An electrically warmed crib is ready to receive the infant. Every instrument and cloth is sterile and untouched by hands. The doctor, scrubbed, gowned and masked, is prepared for any surgical emergency. Graduate nurses scurry to assist him.

People are lonely because they build walls instead of bridges. —JOSEPH FORT NEWTON.

This transformation on obstetrical practices in Clay County began in the vision of a pioneering woman physician, Dr. C. Adeline McConville. In New York in 1909 she heard a lecture by James Anderson Burns, who was promoting a school for mountain children. She was inspired to build a hospital in Oneida. The three-story brick building was completed in 1928 at a cost of $28,000, which Doctor McConville had solicited in small amounts over a period of twenty years. She intended to care for all but the contagious diseases, but soon found she could not meet the high medical standards she set for herself. For the next ten years she tried to give the building away.

Dr. Philip Earle Blackerby, Kentucky State health commissioner, started a broad health program for mothers in medically neglected sections of Kentucky in 1940. One objective of the program was to provide obstetrical care for those women without access to private doctors. Dr. Edwin F. Daily, director of the Division of Health Services of the U. S. Children's Bureau, offered national funds to establish a demonstration maternity hospital in Kentucky, if the state would provide the building and equipment. Doctor Blackerby then accepted Doctor McConville's offer to give her building to the state and the Oneida Maternity Hospital was founded. In 1947 the state matched the Children's Bureau's $30,000 contribution. The cost per patient day was $9.72.

For the past six years the progress of the hospital has been guided by Kentucky's special director for maternal and child health, Dr. Alice Chenoweth, an experienced pediatrician and mother of a three-year-old herself. The first patient was admitted in December of 1941, when the staff consisted of one nurse, one cook and the medical director, Dr. Henry Hollis Caffee. Doctor Caffee brought the hospital through four difficult war years when personnel was almost impossible to get and as hard to keep. He had other troubles. The physical problems encountered in an isolated area are unthought of in cities.

Water supply was a tremendous problem. Water from the hospital well had such a high iron content that it looked like orangeade but tasted salty. Not only was this water unsafe for drinking, but it corroded equipment. Periodically the elevator to the third floor stopped running, and on at least one occasion Doctor Caffee had to lug a 250-pound woman up two flights of steep stairs before operating on her. The mere job of doctoring was not easy. He got many difficult, last-minute deliveries, frequently the botched attempts of unskilled midwives who finally conceded a hemorrhage was too serious for them to cope with. One winter night a baby was born in a truck stalled on an icy mountain road. It reached the hospital several hours later, very much alive, but with its umbilical cord tied off with a shoestring.

The physical plant of the hospital steadily improved. A complete filter system was installed so that water pumped from the river could be used. The balky elevator was replaced by a new one. A complete X-ray chamber was provided. The interior of the hospital was remodeled to contain four wards and completely equipped to care for 25 beds and 22 bassinets. Four incubators were placed in a specially isolated room for tiny early comers. A nurses' cottage was built and furnished in a manner to make it a pleasant place to stay. As new people were added to the staff, the hospital formed its busy routine of service to mountain mothers.

The medical director, assisted by members of his staff, conducts a clinic every Monday at Oneida, every Thursday at the nearest town (Manchester, 19 miles away), and every first and third Wednesday at Annville, in a neighboring county. New patients are received at these clinics for preliminary examination and return periodically for check-ups and advice about diet and physical care during pregnancy. The Manchester clinic has received as many as 100 women in one day.

A completely equipped dental office in a specially built truck travels to each clinic. The public-health dentist does free dental work for those who cannot afford to pay for the service.

To attend the clinics many of the women have to walk or ride muleback from "six mile up a dark holler" before reaching a road. To make sure they will be on hand when the baby is expected, many of them take rooms in boarding-houses in Oneida. The patient load of the hospital rose steadily until the hospital reached a peak in 1946 of 664 deliveries and 916 admissions. There were fewer in 1947, partly because the hospital was closed several weeks for remodeling, but also because of the rapid turnover and unavailability of medical directors.

Following Doctor Caffee's resignation in 1945, the hospital was served by seven different doctors. It became obvious that the state was not going to find a man fulfilling the high professional standards required who would serve very long at a top salary of $5000 per year. Principally to overcome this difficulty, the Oneida hospital was affiliated with the University of Louisville Medical School and General Hospital in July of 1948. Under the new plan the hospital will be staffed by two graduate physicians with at least two years of obstetrical specialization. Each will serve for overlapping periods of six months. The training will be recognized for admission to the American Board of Obstetrics, as a part of its rigorous requirements.

TWENTY-FIVE people now work at the hospital, including a professional staff of six nurses, a supervising nurse and a nutritionist.

Gynecological service, which Doctor Caffee took on in addition to his load of newborn, has all but dropped out of the picture, but is included in future development of Kentucky's Maternal and Child Health Program.

The Oneida project has provided quite a few surprises. Acceptance of the idea of hospital delivery among the mountain people was rapid. The attitude that the hospital is "a good place to go for them as has to" has nearly disappeared. Acceptance of analgesia to help relieve pain of minor incisions such as episiotomy and perineorrhaphy, obstetrical procedures heretofore unheard of in this region, was immediate and even enthusiastic.

Contrary to expectations, there has been almost no objection to the rule that fathers and other relatives stay out of the labor and delivery rooms. Experienced mountain fathers show very little uneasiness about a wife in labor. When they bring them they usually leave promptly and casually return in a day or two. There is much less pacing of the floor and smoking of cigarettes in the lower corridor of this mountain hospital than in city hospitals, although one young father dismally wandered about the hospital yard all of one night. "To be near her," he explained.

BUT to the mountain people, the baby is the thing: nothing beforehand can be very important, all else is anticlimax. Although the medical staff endlessly preaches that prenatal care is the foundation for good obstetrical practice, many of the patients delay coming to the clinics until a late stage o pregnancy.

The mortality of infants after they lea the hospital is another serious problem. Many an infant is taken home in excellent condition, after careful nursing, only to die later from pneumonia, diarrhea or pertussis resulting from improper home care. The mothers are instructed to return with their new babies to the clinics for periodical checkups, but less than 25 per cent do come back unless they think they are pregnant again. The county health department lacks sufficient nurses for follow-up after the new baby leaves the hospital.

One criticism of the hospital is that it gives virtually free obstetrical service to some who can afford, and who can get to, private doctors or conventional hospitals. One girl, married and living in comfortable circumstances in Ohio, returned to her mother's home near Oneida to have her baby delivered through the courtesy of the health department. Although most of the patients give as their home address some small mountain post office not even on the map, some come from quite distant towns in Kentucky. Most give their husbands' employment as farmer or miner, but they list also such occupations as teacher, mail carrier, school superintendent, barber, truck driver, millworker and mechanic.

Private doctors in near-by towns feel that the Oneida hospital should have social-service workers to screen admissions to the hospital on the basis of need. At present the hospital depends on the patients to send new patients—and to return next year themselves.

Although the women are expected to make themselves eligible for hospital delivery by attending the clinics, it has been the policy to refuse no one.

The vast majority of the patients are isolated mountain women really in need. Here they come for essential nursing care, to them a rare luxury. Here first to the light of day come new world citizens, no longer doomed to remain infant-men in a dark womb of hills while civilization struggles for the light. Kentucky is helping to make better, healthier citizens who in turn can make a better, healthier world for themselves and for all of us. No one knows what genius lies buried in these hills. THE END

October Simile

Autumn is like a Chinese house of amber.
In all its rooms the treasures of a prince Dream in the muted sun, though dry vines clamber
Wistfully up the moon gates, and the quince
Taps barren fingers on the casement's sill.
Across the courtyard like a lone white swallow Whispers a woman's skirt. The air turns chill.
One gaunt leaf stirs the pool, and others follow.
Soundless, the wind in silver chastity
Moves the slow willow; breathes an unheard cry
As of a thin flute's wailing melody
Piped to a lady once, in love gone by.
To and fro swing the gates. The dry vines clamber.
Autumn is like a Chinese house of amber.

From experience comes faith

Watch a young boy comparing and selecting book after book.

They look much alike to him now. When he is older, through experience, he will have judgment. He will know books he can live by. The rest can gather dust on the shelf.

Life is like that. Out of each new experience, a man gathers wisdom. He learns to hold fast to things of proven worth.

By comparison, man also learns the value of things unseen, things in which he finally puts his faith.

The expanding American economy has made further growth in college attendance both possible and necessary. Out of the country's increasing wealth, benefactors have strengthened private colleges and universities, and the people have taxed themselves to create and support the great state universities and land-grant colleges and, more recently, local and regional public junior colleges.

Higher education, in turn, has infused ever-greater vitality into our economic life. It has created new wants and needs. It has supplied the inventive and operational genius for an industrial society which depends on knowledge and discovery in the sciences and in research and training in technology.

Commenting on the results of widespread university education in the United States, as compared with Great Britain, Sir Ernest Simon, in an address at an educational conference in his country, reported that "the majority of influential men in industry [in the United States] have themselves had a university education, and are, therefore, more inclined to employ university graduates both for research and for other purposes. By way of contrast, in the Lancashire cotton industry there are hardly any university men in important positions, and largely for this reason not one per cent of the firms in the industry are scientifically equipped to make anything like full use of the results of the excellent research work of the Cotton Research Association!"

The expansion of secondary and higher education has also broadened the cultural base of American life. Once only the wealthy had access to the arts, and only a few people had the opportunity to learn about literature, art and music. But as the curriculum of both the high schools and the colleges has been enriched by introduction of courses in these fields, and as more and more students have enjoyed a general and liberal education in recent years, the arts have become a part of the life of the American people.

> If you want to get a good general view of a man's karacter, find out from him what his opinion ov his nabor iz.
> —JOSH BILLINGS.

Necessary as education is for our economic advancement, valuable as it is for cultural enjoyment, it is even more essential for citizenship in a modern democratic society and in a world of interdependent nations and peoples. A democracy cannot exist merely with an intellectual elite, but must have many citizens who possess a deep understanding of the problems of modern life, who are devoted to the purposes and ideals of a free society, and who will take a responsible part in public affairs.

The security and improvement of our way of life depends on a maximum, not a minimum, degree of popular education. The problems of our time are so complex and so urgent that universal high-school education is no longer sufficient to give us a people adequately prepared for their civic responsibilities. Our nation desperately needs a large body of citizens with an extended general and liberal education which puts "central emphasis on focal problems of our culture and the intellectual skills and moral habits with which to cope with them."

SIR ERNEST SIMON has said that if the United States is making a mistake in giving university education to too many students, it is surely one of the noblest mistakes in history. The danger in extending the benefits of general and liberal education to still more young people is that we may forget the importance of excellence. To have made high-school education universal, and higher education available to increasing numbers, is a great democratic accomplishment, but it has been attained at the expense of attention to individual needs and abilities. One of the results of this lack of individualization is that students of high capacity are so often not stimulated to make the most of their intellectual potentialities. We need to exercise much more ingenuity, not only in the high schools, but also in the colleges, to provide a unifying education without making it an intellectually leveling one. Our failure to measure up in intelligent statesmanship to the problems of our time is tragical evi dent, and it portends only disaster the future. Unless higher education, whi aids ing the whole level of social intell ence among the people, can also supply bi ant and dedicated leadership, democrac wi fail. Schools and colleges have no mo im portant task than that of identifyi the ablest among their students, stimu in them to high attainment, and moti in them to serve the public welfare. It is n pe democratic to recognize and nurture sel lectual talent, or any other kind of u ua aptitude. A free society needs all the nt that it can find. The problem in Am an education is neither to neglect the br students nor to undervalue the abilit of those who are more modestly endowe to capitalize to the fullest the potentia es of all our people.

IN its last yearbook, on The Expa Role of Education, the American Associ of School Administrators emphasized th portance of special attention to the a pupils: "According to conservative an thoritative estimates, more than a m children with exceptionally high intelli are now enrolled in the public schools. special training is provided only for a one in ten of this group. Because the pu school program is so generally designe the large middle group, and all too seldo adapted to those who are gifted, these dren must be rescued from the neglect w usually is their lot."

The problem of quality in education is only that of better training for the gi Improvement in educational procedur necessary all along the line, from the hig reaches of the educati system to its lowest gra The yearbook just m tioned was devoted to improvements and de opments that are urge needed at all levels. It vocates better provis for young children, the richment of secondary ucation, a fuller program of adult educati better care of exceptional children whet they are handicapped or especially gift better educational facilities and equipme and above all, better teachers and bet teaching.

This is the program, broadly sketch that farsighted citizens and educators ha set for American education. How can it put into effect?

The goals certainly will not be attained we leave the future of education to a faith few. The rest of us must take our full sha of the responsibility for discovering what t schools need and for devoting time a energy to their development.

This means studying the reports of t superintendent of schools. It means parti pating in the activities of the parent-teacher association and taking part in communit wide discussions of educational affairs. means actively supporting the movement f adequate teachers' salaries. It means accor ing teachers the respect that the professio deserves and giving them the encourag ment that their efforts merit. On the pri ciple that in the long run the community wi secure the kind of education that it want for its children, it means that we should for a basic conception of what the educationa product should be.

Citizens at large cannot determine how th schools should be administered day by day They are not competent to specify the mean by which educational purposes are to be at tained, such as the particular courses to b given, or the methods of teaching to be used These are matters for the professional staff o the schools to settle. But citizens do have re sponsibility for understanding broad educa tional policy and for making clear the kind o schools they want.

The most effective way to secure bette schools is to elect better school-board mem bers. The qualifications of good board mem bers are thoughtful, intelligent understand ing of the purposes of education in a given ou ie commitment, namely, to the welfare f t entire community and of all its people, ro g and old.

But what will it cost to secure the kind of ch ls we need and want? Can we afford the pr am that has been proposed?

Before answering these questions, we ho d realize that educational conditions ha been steadily deteriorating, primarily be se of inadequate financial support.
Th urgency of greater financial support s it occasioned by new needs alone; it s o caused by the fact that in relation o e dollar's purchasing power, the total na nal expenditure for public education ha declined since 1940! Furthermore, the po on of the national income devoted to ed ation dropped by one half between 1940 an 1947, from 3 per cent to 1½ per cent.
Po ting out that "with surprising regularity ch l expenditures have remained at, or beov the amounts spent by people annually on obacco products," the American Assoia on of School Administrators has remi led us that the kind of education this country needs cannot be obtained for "cigarette money."

One of the consequences of our failure even to maintain the level of our educational expenditures is that teachers' salaries have lagged far behind the gains made by other groups.

Professor Seymour E. Harris, of the Harvard Graduate School of Public Administration, has recently published a careful analysis of the problems of educational finance under the title, How Shall We Pay for Education? After reviewing extensive statistical data on teachers' salaries, he came to the following conclusion:

"In recent years, while national income rose at an unprecedented rate, the pay of teachers did not rise even as much as the cost of living. Teachers suffered both an absolute and a relative deterioration in their position. Teachers, and particularly professors, whose income did not rise even so much as that of schoolteachers, have a real grievance."

The consequences of this unfavorable economic situation are low morale; a desperate teacher shortage, particularly in elementary and rural schools; and debasement of the quality of new entrants to the teaching profession.

Obviously, our first task is to make up our losses in financial support for education at all levels. The quality of education in the schools and colleges has already suffered serious impairment, which would have been much greater without the excess expenditure of time and energy on the part of a large number of devoted and competent teachers. But personal sacrifice and devotion by these people will not be sufficient to hold the line much longer; further educational deterioration is inevitable unless citizens come speedily to the financial rescue of their schools.

But to regain our losses is not enough. New personal and social needs call for better education than we have yet provided. We must therefore be prepared to spend a proportionately greater part of our national income on the schools than we have done at best in the past. How large is the bill likely to be?

After appraising present deficiencies, and estimating the cost, not of a generous educational program, but of one which would modestly meet the needs for improvement, the Association of School Administrators has asked the American people to increase its expenditures for public education, mainly elementary and secondary, by about $5,000,000,000 annually, making a total yearly expenditure of $8,000,000,000. The President's Commission on Higher Education estimated that the cost of the program it proposed would reach approximately $2,000,000,000 for public institutions by 1960.

Can we afford to support education so generously?

After analyzing educational expenditures and taxation in relation to national income, Professor Harris came to the conclusion that we can. The tax burden for all public purposes, it is true, has increased steadily, and in recent years it has grown enormously. But, as Professor Harris has pointed out, "Tax capacity has probably risen even more rapidly than taxes. The country has a much higher output and standard of living than it had 25, 50 or 100 years ago. Though prices are about 100 per cent higher than they were in 1913, national income, after taxes, is about five times as high."

No one believes that it will be easy to meet the cost of this country's educational needs, though when we put the amount we spend for education alongside what we spend for tobacco, liquor, cosmetics and luxuries of all kinds, we have reason to be pretty sheepish. Such a comparison should lead us to provide vastly increased funds for education at all levels. To this additional support local communities, the states and the Federal Government all should make substantial contributions.

However, although most local communities can and should raise more money for education, the states and the Federal Government will have to supply the larger share of the additional funds. One of the reasons for this is that local communities already provide the lion's share of the cost of education. In 1941, these local communities supplied 88 per cent of school expenditures, while the state governments contributed 11 per cent and the Federal Government 1 per cent. Another reason why local governments cannot supply all the additional money is that the general property tax is their principal source of revenue, and this tax is inelastic and therefore relatively unresponsive to changes in the general economic situation.

State revenues, on the other hand, respond somewhat more sensitively to rising prices and costs, and the state has more sources of tax income than local governments. Consequently, in states where the local communities still raise most of the tax revenue for public schools, the state government should assume a proportionately larger share of the cost of education. Even so, state and local governments together will be unable to supply all the necessary funds.

It is apparent, then, that the Federal Government will have to assume greater responsibility for financing public education. It has the most flexible and responsive tax system and the greatest taxing capacity. But this is not the only reason for Federal support. The poorer states cannot possibly raise their educational standards to a minimum level of quantity and quality without help from the Federal Government.

Why should the wealthier states help to support education in poorer areas? They should do so, first, because the national interest makes it necessary. Illiteracy and a low level of educational attainment make fertile soil for social unrest. Furthermore, inadequate educational opportunities are both the product and the cause of economic insufficiency. To raise standards of education in economically retarded regions may be expected ultimately to stimulate the development of their natural and human resources and so enable them to contribute more fully to the whole national economy. Rich states should be concerned with the quality of education in the poorer ones, too, because there is a constant flow of people from one area to another. For the country at large 20 per cent of the population was born outside the state of present residence.

There are important limitations that must be placed around Federal support for education. The principle that education is a function of the states should be explicitly recognized. Federal funds should be channeled through state agencies instead of being granted directly to local governments. Every safeguard against Federal political intervention in the schools should be raised. Most students of educational finance agree that this can be done.

A national committee, in outlining a comprehensive nation-wide program of education, concluded that "With adequate planning, the resources of the country as a whole can be made available for the support of public education in the several states without endangering the role that the latter should rightfully play in the support, control and administration of their schools."

The American people can supply the funds for better schools and colleges. Whether or not they will provide them will depend on what they value most. It will be a tragedy indeed if they put other things before the welfare of their children and the future of their nation and civilization. The future of education in this country will be indicated by the interest we take in the schools of our community, in the attitudes we register by our votes in matters concerning school policy and by the appropriations we cause our communities, our states and our Federal Government to make for educational purposes.

THE END

The President's Commission on Higher Education said the task of general education is to lead students:

1. To develop a code of ethical principles for the regulation of their personal and civic life.

2. To participate actively as informed and responsible citizens in solving the social, economic and political problems of the community, state and nation.

3. To recognize the interdependence of the different peoples of the world and to take personal responsibility for fostering international understanding and peace.

4. To understand the natural environment, to apply habits of scientific thought in the solution of concrete problems in all fields, and to appreciate the implications of scientific discoveries for human welfare.

5. To understand other people's ideas and to express their own ideas effectively in speaking and writing.

6. To attain emotional maturity and to learn how to work co-operatively and constructively with other persons.

7. To maintain and improve their own health and to co-operate actively and intelligently in promoting the health of the entire community.

8. To understand and enjoy literature, art, music and other cultural activities, and to participate in some form of creative expression.

9. To acquire the knowledge and attitudes basic to a satisfying family life.

10. To choose a socially useful and personally satisfying vocation that will fully capitalize their particular interests and talents.

11. To acquire and use the skills, habits and attitudes that are involved in critical and constructive thinking.

HANDMADE linens are a luxury every woman can a these days if she sews or crochets even the most simp stitches. Try making some of these charming designs for gifts or for your own table. You can order directions for doing them, from the JOURNAL. ★

Crochet has a different look these days. The designs are open and lacy and the stitches are newly styled for edging mats and doilies. Crochet combines with colored linens into fascinating schemes for everyday and party use.

Linen by the yard is again plentiful and comes in all colors, so that you can match your best china or potter without difficulty.

Using finer thread gives to crochet the handmade-lace e which your party linens should have. Coarser threads nicely for the starched mats and colored crochet, but y best set should be dainty and fine.

You can make your mats any size you find suitable, for proportions of your table key their dimensions. Here is a to find the best size: Cut pieces of paper and try them ou mats on your own table. If your table is small, perhaps on each side and one at each end will be all you can use. E mats for a party setting are nice to have if you have e leaves for your table.

A mat should be large enough to accommodate the pl flat silver and perhaps the water glass and bread-and-bu plate. It takes a rather deep mat to hold both the glass bread-and-butter plate, so watch out for that. Cut all y paper patterns first and make sure the size suits your c table. Bought mats are usually under 12″ x 18″.

Draw threads to keep the edges of your linen straight, be careful to ease in the crochet at the corners so the mats lie flat. If you are an amateur, a beginner's book on croc will be helpful, and friends are always delighted to teach y new tricks.

It brought another laugh. Dark little Joey minced forward, holding out a hand to greet the kid. Joey, who cursed better than anybody in the dormitory, and tall, lanky Creep were Fats' particular friends. Creep wandered around at night and had once made the mistake of bothering Jimmie. There were a half dozen other delinks in the group and a couple stinkers who were allowed to join the gang because they did things for Fats. They had the privilege of beating up the other stinkers too.

"Come inter the parlor," Joey invited.

But the kid was wise. Jimmie could see that. He stood planted in the same spot Mrs. O'Leary had left him. He stared at them with his big eyes wide open and not a tear in them. But he shivered and his tiny fists were clenched at the end of the sleeves of his torn blue sweater. Usually the stinkers pulled back and tried to climb the door when the delinks started on them, but this one stood right up to them, scared as he was.

Fats gave the signal. "All right, stinker. Shell out." He held out his hand.

The kid looked at him wondering, his teeth still chattering.

"Doncha understand English?" Fats asked him, getting annoyed now. "I told ya to give."

The kid flinched away from the menacing hand, but he still said nothing. Nor did he cry. Fats cursed him and brought his right hand around in back of the kid. Then the hand darted and caught the stinker back of the neck and Fats' strong fingers kneaded the tender muscles just under the skull. The kid gasped and suddenly there were two big tears in his eyes. He bit his lips and his puny fists started to rake at Fats. He squirmed under the painful hold and looked like a kitten choking on the end of a string, wildly trying for the strangling cord but actually helpless because he had no claws even if he did reach it.

> Virtue is not left to stand alone. He who practices it will have neighbors.
> — CONFUCIUS.

Fats laughed and waved the others on. It was over in a minute. They swarmed over the kid and trampled him down. Fats emptied his pockets, then kicked him in the side.

"Ya don't say nothin' to the matron, get that," he warned.

He got no reply. All through the brief scuffle the kid hadn't made a sound. Jimmie could not see him, but he could see the disappointed faces of the delinks. Apparently they hadn't gotten very much, not even the fun of the stinker's frantic cries. This one just didn't give.

Jimmie turned back to his comic. He never participated in the welcome given the stinkers, but only because he did not need a share of the few pennies or the small things the delinks took from them. He was quite accustomed to the practice of initiating them, but he had his own racket and scoffed at the other delinks who depended on the stinkers for their extras. He had forty cents in his pocket and, when darkness came, he planned to get out and spend it.

He would do the round of the newspaper coin boxes on Front Street and then enjoy himself. That was his racket. Under his blanket he had two copies of an old newspaper. With them under his arm he went the length of Front Street and took a nickel or a dime from each box. He never took all the change because then the newspaper guy would realize he was being robbed. With a nickel or so, the sucker probably thought some crumby customers just didn't pay.

None of the fellows knew his racket, but all of them knew how he got out of the Shelter each night. He had laid down the law that, without his permission, nobody could use the washroom window. It was his. He had discovered that the wire screening was fastened to the rotten molding instead of being sunk into the brick. It was easy to push it out enough to drop onto the fire escape that led down to the alley beside the courthouse.

Fats had challenged the order just on He had used the washroom window wh Jimmie was out. In front of them all, Jimm had cut and kicked him into a promise ne to do it again. Fats was fourteen, a y older than Jimmie, but he was easy licki because Jimmie fought to hurt as well beat. He ripped and kneed and never q on a fellow until he no longer had the streng to yell for mercy. Fats was too soft, t blubbery for anybody as wiry and har boned, anybody who fought for keeps ea time.

Jimmie reached for another comic and w startled by the sound of crying. A stink crying during the day? Usually they waile at night until some delink told them to sh up and then they swallowed their sobs. The it sounded worse than if they bawled rigl out.

It was the stinker, the new one, and h was right in the next cot, the one that Jim mie kept empty so he wouldn't be bothere at night. The kid was face down on the c and his shoulders shook. Why cry now, Jim mie wondered, when he hadn't let out a pee during the mobbing?

"Hey, hey you, Dave," Jimmie called an leaned over to shake him.

The tears streaked the skinny face and th kid swallowed hard to hold back the sob He raised on one elbow and Jimmie notice that his fists were clenched again.

"I ain't got nothin' left, nothin'," the ki said in a strangled voice.

Jimmie laughed. Th kid was ready to fight eve while he cried! "I don' want nothin', except tha you get outa that cot. don't like company." H saw a look of fear pass in faint riffle across Dave' face. "It ain't nothin against you, kid, just that I keep that co empty. There's plenty empty ones down th end there. Take one o' those."

The kid swung his legs over the side wea rily. He wiped a sleeve across his nose and inched forward. He was trembling again "All right. I don't care. I'll go down there. Even if they sock me again. Maybe—maybe I kin catch him one."

"Huh? Whaddya mean?" Jimmie asked. "Who's gonna sock you fer takin' one o those cots?"

Dave dropped off and stood up, starting to push the sweater down into his trousers. Then he pulled up the sleeves of the sweater. He was getting set to fight. "Those guys. They said I should sleep in this cot or they'd sock me again. But I don't care. I'll go. I'll kill him. He took my—my ——" His voice trailed off and Jimmie grabbed his arm.

"What guys? Fats and the rest?"

Dave nodded and Jimmie felt his thin arm struggle under the grip. He let go.

"Wait a while," he ordered. So Fats was feeling wise again? He knew Jimmie wanted that cot empty, but he sent a stinker over to use it. "You stay right here," he told Dave. "What'd they take from you?"

The kid hung his head. "A—a little—a doll. It's my Weemie," he yelled at Jimmie. "I always had it. I ain't a sissy. I just always had it an' they took it away." He blubbered even while he knotted his fists. Jimmie remembered one time he had cried like a stinker about something he'd lost, something he couldn't remember except that it was important.

"Well, take it easy," Jimmie said impatiently. "You stay right here."

He found Fats on his cot, holding court. The other delinks sat on the adjoining cots, all of them bored. The brief flurry of excitement caused by the new stinker was all over. Now they were waiting for Fats to decide what to do next. Fats sat upright when he saw Jimmie.

"Didju tell that stinker to sleep next to me?" Jimmie asked mildly.

Fats grinned tentatively and looked around at the others. "Just kiddin', Jimmie. I thought we'd have some fun with the stinker."

Jimmie knew differently. Fats had thought that he would kick the kid out of the cot and then Fats would send him back to it. They'd have a lot of fun shoving the kid back and forth. Only Fats thought it up to annoy him, Jimmie knew.

"I don't like it," he said quietly. Then his hand snaked out and caught Fats by the hair. "I don't like your kinda fun. Don't do it again."

He yanked hard and pulled Fats' face over his knees. Stepping back, he bumped into somebody and kicked viciously. He pulled Fats over the edge of the cot and kneed his face hard. Then he rabbit-punched with both hands and Fats fell onto the floor. Jimmie stepped back quickly, but none of the others seemed to want to fight. He kicked Fats alongside the head, but just skinned him.

"I was just kiddin'," Fats pleaded.

"Well, don't kid no more," Jimmie said slowly as the red went away. "Gimme what you took from the stinker."

"We didn't take nothin'." Fats shifted quickly as Jimmie's shoe swiped at his head.

"I said gimme."

"He didn't have nothin' but a doll," Fats pleaded. "Honest he didn't."

"Gimme."

THEY all scrambled around and Joey found it under one of the cots. He gave it to Jimmie. It was a scarred, chipped little replica of a baby. Not even a real doll, just a figure. Jimmie wondered what the hell anybody, even a stinker, would want with it. Still, he had to treat it as though it were important.

"All right. I'm gonna let that stinker stay right there. I don't want nobody botherin' him. Understand that?" He kicked at Fats again, not trying to hit him. "You 'specially, Fats. Mess with that stinker an' you get it the next time."

He walked away from them, annoyed at himself. He had to show them who was boss, but now he had a stinker on his neck. He threw the little doll onto the cot.

"Here it is. You sleep on that cot. If anybody bothers you, tell me."

The stinker grabbed at the doll as if it were something good to eat and his eyes were soft and brown, like the puppy's. Jimmie threw himself on his cot. The stinker would probably bawl all night and keep him awake after he got back all tired out. What a hell of a note, putting stinkers in with delinks.

Jimmie had a good time that night. He took only thirty-five cents out of the newspaper boxes and ate a couple hot dogs. Then he went up to the old block to see if any of the fellows were around.

Danny Simpson greeted Jimmie as though he were one of the gang of big guys. "Out again, Jimmie?" he kidded. "They might as well give up tryin' to hold you."

Jimmie warmed up to him. Danny was a swell guy. He was always dressed up and could afford to be. He had a good racket rigging suckers for a pool game.

"I got office hours outside," Jimmie boasted. "Anythin' new?" He lounged against the drugstore window alongside Danny.

"Sure. Justine Cooley told me she's gonna get you life fer rollin' that drunk."

"I didn't roll him," Jimmie protested. "I got caught afore I could." Then he saw that Danny was kidding about Mrs. Cooley, the probation officer. She had been sore when they brought Jimmie in, charged with robbing a drunk just outside the Shamrock Bar. But she would never tell Danny that. "She told me you were the guy who shoulda got life down at the Boys' School when you was a delink."

"I was always too smart fer them," Danny answered modestly. "But I never was able to get outa the Shelter the way you do." Jimmie swelled with pride. "Better get goin' though, kid. O'Reilly is due around soon. I'll see ya around."

Jimmie felt like a big shot as he wandered back downtown. That Danny sure was a swell guy. He looked a little pale from the powder he put on his face to hide the blotches of pimples, but he sure dressed like a big-timer.

Jimmie took in the show at the Paramount before going back to the Shelter. He had his own private entrance, the side door. When somebody came out Jimmie caught the door with his foot, then he scooted inside. By the time the usher caught sight of him, he was down the stairs to the men's room and up the other stairs to the far side of the lobby. The usher never chased Jimmie because he never knew whether he was just a decoy and a whole gang would pour in and disappear in the darkness.

Jimmie climbed halfway up the fire escape before he noticed that the lights were on in the boys' dormitory. At first he thought that maybe somebody had caught wise and he started back down the iron steps. But then he started thinking about it. It could be that one of the stinkers was sick. If so, the lights would be turned off in a hurry and he could sneak in. If Mrs. O'Leary had noticed he was gone he'd just have to bluff his way on it in the morning. At least, he should find out what had happened. If he beat it now, they'd really start looking for him and when they caught him it would be the county jail, not the soft touch he had at the Shelter.

He climbed back up the fire escape and over the railing to get at the window next to his washroom window. He could see part of the dormitory through the thick screen, down to the corner where his cot was. Most of the fellows were sitting up in bed and watching Mrs. O'Leary down there. Old Clem, the night watchman, was with her and they were talking in front of an empty cot. Jimmie cursed. One of the guys might have beat it, using his window. Or they might be missing him. He counted the cots from the far wall. His was number six, but they were in front of the fifth cot, the one the new stinker had. It was empty. Jimmie looked at his own cot and nearly fell off the window ledge. Somebody was in it. He could see only the back of the head, the dark hair spread on the pillow, but there was a body under the thin gray blanket.

Nothing is so firmly believed as what we least know.

Jimmie decided he had better see what was going on. He had nothing to lose. He skinned under the washroom screen and tip-toed to the door. Mrs. O'Leary and Clem were still down there. Jimmie started to rip off his clothes. He kept the long underwear on and rolled his stuff in his pants and shoved the bundle back of a water basin. He rumpled his hair and started slowly out of the washroom, eyes half closed and his bare feet shuffling. He got halfway down the aisle between the cots before they noticed him.

"By—by gosh, it's Jimmie," Mrs. O'Leary hissed in the mistaken impression that she was keeping her voice down.

Jimmie ambled up to them, a stocky, sleepy figure in his long underwear. "Anybody sick, Mrs. O'Leary?"

She gulped and looked at his cot. Whoever it was had the blanket up over his face so that only the top of the head was showing. The body was rigid, did not even seem to be breathing.

"Who—who's that in your bed, Jimmie?" Mrs. O'Leary asked.

"Huh? In my bed? Ain't nobody in it," Then he opened his eyes wide. "Oh, you mean my old bed. I swapped with that new stinker today."

She heaved a relieved sigh. "We thought you were in that bed and Dave was gone."

"Oh. How could he beat it, Mis' O'Leary? He wuz fast asleep when I went into the can." (Continued on Page 123)

Old Clem shuffled forward, peered down him. "You wasn't in the can a little bit o, Jimmie. I looked."

"Can't a guy go to the can without makin' ass?" He winked at Mrs. O'Leary. "He n't see much. Too much booze."

"Why, damn yer misbegotten soul, —"

Mrs. O'Leary stamped her foot and the or shook. "Clem, don't you go cursin' him . Jimmie don't give any trouble. Except k at him. He ain't put on his nightgown. nmie, how many times have I told all of u not to sleep in your underwear?"

"Yes, ma'am. I'll change now. I was ed. Kin I go back to bed now?"

He waited till they were through the door d the lights snapped off, Clem still arguing th Mrs. O'Leary. Then he shook the rigid m in his bed.

"That you, Dave?"

There was a tentative stirring. "Y-yes. nmie?"

"Yep. What happened? Keep it low."

He felt the kid's ad come close to s. "I—I was scared ey might pull the anket away."

Jimmie put an arm t and it fell on the d's back. He was embling. "It's kay. They went. ut how'd they get ise?"

Dave started shak- g more violently. I—I can't tell ya."

"You ——" Jim- ie stopped to con- d'er. "Somebody id you shouldn't ll?"

The kid began to b. "He—he said e'd kill me . . . ut—but I don't re."

Jimmie got stiff. Who?"

"It was Fats. He me over an' felt round your bed. hen he told me. He id he'd throw me ff the fire escape."

Jimmie patted his ack. "Quit yer akin'. He ain't onna do that. Be- ause he's gonna get row'd off first. So when he told you, ya ot inter my bed?" Dave sobbed but said othing. "Well, you take it easy, kid. Fats in't gonna be able to touch ya."

He climbed into his own cot and wondered bout the stinker. He had tried to cover up r Jimmie even though Fats threatened him nd he could have been discovered by Mrs. O'Leary. Why should he stick his neck out? t was strange. He heard Dave sob only nce or twice before his breathing became egular and blended with the rest of the reathing and snores and night noises of the lark dormitory. Above the subdued chorus vas the sound of some stinker down at the nd, whimpering and pleading in a high voice.

THEY found Fats on the washroom floor ight after breakfast. He had fought against going out the washroom window and was too eavy for Jimmie to force. They had scuffled and then Jimmie caught him in the groin with a solid kick and dropped him to the tile floor. He jumped him and pounded Fats' head on the floor until it rolled in his hands and blood started to mat the hair. Then he had washed his hands and gone back into the dormitory to get his breakfast plate.

His face was stony as he watched Mrs. Cooley come down the dormitory, questioning each of the kids. He knew nobody would stool. He'd sent word around that Fats had stooled on him and got just what he deserved. When Mrs. Cooley reached him, he could see she was sore. None of the fellows had split. If they had, she'd be coming to him all soft and soapy.

"Jimmie, you know anything?" she asked. Her voice was deep and sweet.

Jimmie always did like her, but classed her with the social workers. Give a social worker half a chance and she'll have you in Sunday school before you're awake.

"'Bout what, Mis' Cooley?" he asked.

"You know. About Roy. He is badly hurt. We had to take him to a hospital. It's serious, Jimmie." It was the first time he had known that Fats' name was Roy.

"I don't know nothin', Mis' Cooley. I was eatin' my breakfast an' I heard the fellers yell an' I ran an' there was Fats all laid out."

SHE sighed. "All right, Jimmie." She turned toward Dave and then back again. "But before breakfast, Jimmie?"

"I was asleep." He stared right at her as he said it.

She turned away without another word and Jimmie got tense. Dave was just a stinker, after all, and Mrs. Cooley was smart.

"What's your name, sonny? I don't remember you."

"Dave." He clipped it and held onto himself. But he started shaking again. Jimmie was disgusted. Any time anything happened, the kid shook.

"Oh, Dave. Did—did you hear or see anything?"

The kid shook his head.

"You're sure, Dave? You didn't see anybody hit Roy?"

Again Dave shook his head, but he started to work his lips as though he were choking something back. She watched and waited while Jimmie got more uneasy.

"But I'm glad," Dave finally blurted out.

"You're glad Roy was hurt? But why, Dave? The poor boy is in serious condition."

"I don't care. I'm glad."

Jimmie felt he had to stop it. The stinker was all excited. "All the stinkers hate Fats, Mis' Cooley. He's tough on 'em. See Dave's lip?"

She looked at the split lip, then at Jimmie. "Did you do it, Jimmie? Because of that?"

He laughed scornfully. "Me beat up a guy fer a stinker? Naw, Mis' Cooley. Not me."

She took a long look at Jimmie and he squirmed under it. Not much got by her, that he knew. She turned on her heels and did not even follow down the row of cots to question the other fellows. She went right on out of the dormitory. Jimmie followed her with his eyes, wondering. It could be that Dave had put her wise. He looked at the kid, wanting to swipe him for opening his mouth. But Dave's brown eyes were pleading and Jimmie remembered that, once Fats recovered consciousness, he probably would tell them. He had stooled once. He would again.

He thought about it all morning. Jimmie knew he was in the soup. This, on top of a pinch for rolling a drunk and all the other delinquencies on his record, would be certain to send him to the Boys' School, the reform school downstate. There was no way out of it, he concluded. The thing to do was get out and start going. They'd catch him, but at least before they did he'd have a little fun. With the problem settled, he sat up on his cot and looked around him. Dave was sitting

Strength

By Pauline Havard

Strength is a lion, blazing-eyed,
Crouched low among the jungle grasses;
Strength is a young hawk strong in pride,
Circling above the mountain passes.

Strength is another thing as well:
The quiet strength of a mother's love;
The hour notes struck by beauty's bell;
The strength some dreams are fashioned of;

The strength of pity in time of grief;
The vine of kindness no years can sever.
The lion and hawk—their strength is brief,
But the strength of the gentle lives forever!

posite him, staring patiently. The stinker as a queer one.

"Say, Dave," Jimmie said offhand, "you d pretty smart last night. Got me outa a le."

The kid's face opened wide. "You ain't re at me?"

"Huh? You mean 'cause of what you said Mis' Cooley? No. I kin take care o' my-
lf. Fats'll tell 'em anyway."

"Ain't you scared what they'll do?"
ave's eyes worshiped him.

"Me?" Jimmie smiled out of one corner his mouth. "They'll have to catch me st, kid. I get out every night, don't I? I n get out tonight."

"You—you ain't comin' back?"

"Don't you split about it, Dave," Jimmie id quickly, and got a violent nod in return.
You're okay, Dave, fer a stinker. When're our folks comin' fer ya?"

"I dunno. I got no people, 'cept my aunt, id she kicked me out."

"Oh. Well, you'll stay here till you go to e orphanage." Jimmie thought about it.
he kid would be a sucker for the delinks.
e'd try to fight back all the time. But aybe they would get him to the orphanage efore he got beat up too much. "I'd give ou some money, Dave, but the delinks'd st take it away. I dunno, kid. I guess you st got to take it fer a while."

The big, brown eyes were close to being arful again. "Kin I go with you, Jimmie?
in I? I won't be a kid, honest I won't."

Jimmie looked at him so long he almost greed. The kid was shaking again and he ooked as though somebody ought to take im and tell him what o do.

"No, Dave," he relied. "They'll catch me n' it's the reform school fter that. You wouldn't ke it. The orphanage is uch better. Honest, it
. I wouldn't kid ya. You etter stay."

Dave swallowed a number of sobs and ied to look brave. He dug into his pocket.
I guess I didn't really expect you to take
e. Here"—he held out his hand—"you, ou kin have my Weemie." He pushed it nto Jimmie's hand and then threw himself n the cot. Then he really cried. He sobbed nd bawled and it made Jimmie feel like a ouse. He'd heard stinkers cry before, but ey never had bothered him. He looked at e little doll Dave had given him and reembered what it probably meant to the id. It was something he had had before anyody was after him, before he had to be ared of people.

Jimmie crossed over to him and patted is shoulder. "Cut that stuff out, Dave. ou're a crybaby. Here, take the doll. I on't need it. I got one of my own." He topped, startled at himself for thinking that ne up. "Look, Dave. Cut out the bawlin' n' look at me. I owe ya fer last night. How bout if we both went out fer some fun toight an' then I'll bring ya back? How about ? The movies, popcorn, dogs, anythin' ya ant."

DAVE lifted from the pillow and gulped.
He clutched at the doll and Jimmie knew he adn't wanted to give it up. "You kin have , Jimmie," he said, "but if you got one ourself ——"

"Sure, sure. How about it? Comin' out ith me tonight?"

Dave nodded hard through the tears and miled while they ran into his mouth.

They started out with Dave trembling be-ide him all the way down the fire escape and p the alley until they had reached the side-alk and people passed them without taking ny notice. Then Dave's hand relaxed in is and Jimmie was able to relax too. The id shivered too much. He'd never make a elink.

They had hot dogs first at a stand near he movie on Front Street. Dave had orange op for the first time and he strangled when he gas got in his nose. Then they skinned into the Paramount and saw a pretty good picture, a little too much dancing and singing, but pretty good. By the time they got out and had another hot dog Dave was all himself. He bubbled and chattered away while his big eyes stared at the people.

Jimmie enjoyed having him along. It was the same kind of night he'd had lots of times, but somehow seemed more fun with the little stinker being so surprised about things. He thought of the darkness and cold out in the country later and wished he could have company.

They went out to the old block to say good-by. Jimmie knew that Danny probably would wonder what happened to him if he didn't show up, and decided to tell him he was taking it on the lam. Danny would think it was quite a stunt for a young delink like him.

"Hey, Danny," Jimmie shouted from the corner. "Been lookin' fer ya."

DANNY was up against the drugstore, as usual, but he didn't look happy to see Jimmie. From his other side appeared Patrolman O'Reilly, who had been standing there, chatting.

"Well, well, if it ain't little Jimmie who's down at the Shelter right now," O'Reilly said. Then he noticed Dave, who was clinging to Jimmie's hand. "Who's this ye got with ye?"

"Nobody, Mr. O'Reilly." Jimmie looked back. The sidewalk was clear. He could cut down the alley between the drugstore and the poolroom. He started to pry his hand loose from Dave's, but stopped. Hell, they'd give the stinker the works.

"Looks like you're it, Jimmie," Danny said. "Who's the kid?"

"He's just a stinker down at the Shelter."

Danny laughed. "Seems like you can't tell these kids nothin', O'Reilly. I told Jimmie not to get mixed up with no stinkers. Looks like you got yourself into it this time, Jimmie."

Officer O'Reilly did not seem pleased. "All right, ye criminals, come on. I ain't gonna ring the wagon fer the likes of you."

They spent the night in the city jail. All the way there Dave clung to Jimmie, and once in the cell he plucked at his sweater. "Jimmie, did I—was it my fault?"

Jimmie was a little uncertain himself, what with the unfamiliar surroundings of the cell and the click of the barred door. "Aincha never been in the clink afore? Doncha worry, we ain't in trouble. The Juvenile Court people'll come fer us in the mornin'. You better get some sleep. Ye're shakin' again."

It was much better in the morning. Dave was rested and he was curious about things, not scared. He even laughed when Jimmie asked the turnkey for a can opener so they could get out of the jail. It was a crack Danny had made once.

A city cop took them over to Juvenile Court early and they sat on the hard benches, watching the worried-looking men and women with their bawling kids.

When Mrs. Cooley came out of the office for them, Jimmie swaggered along in front of her, holding Dave's hand. He wasn't too worried. He knew what he would get and probably the stinker would get off. Probation officers are suckers for kids that cry and say they won't do it again. He himself had quit that a long time ago. He could take anything they threw at him.

Mrs. Cooley concentrated on Jimmie. "I don't have to tell you what this means, do I?"

"Naw. I know. Boys' School."

"It's no fun down there, Jimmie. You'll have to stay till you're twenty-one because you have no folks to be paroled to."

Jimmie nodded and smiled. If they thought they could hold him once he got wise to the place, they had another think coming.

"Fats was able to talk last night, Jimmie," she continued. "I saw him in the hospital."

He shrugged. What difference did it make? He could go to the reform school for laying out Fats just as well as for anything else.

"Too bad he could talk. If'n he'd got at Dave, the stinker wouldn't be able to talk."

"Oh." She sort of gasped. "So that's the way it was? Fats told me he fell, Jimmie."

He kicked out at the desk. She'd tricked him. He had just assumed that Fats would stool. Why didn't he keep his mouth shut?

"Jimmie done it fer me," Dave blurted out, so tense that he almost fell off the chair. "Fats was gonna push me offa the fire escape."

"I see. Why was he going to do that, Dave?" she asked quickly.

"'Cause I ——" He bit down on his tongue and hung his head.

Jimmie smiled at Mrs. Cooley. He was proud of the kid. When it came to the clutch, he knew how to keep his mouth shut.

"Well, it doesn't matter now." She sighed. "It seems a shame, though, that you got Dave in trouble, too, Jimmie. I was going to try to get him into somebody's home, maybe some people who would adopt him later. Now I suppose I'll have to send him to the Boys' School too."

"Oh, willya, ma'am, willya? Kin I go with Jimmie?"

Jimmie turned on him fiercely, angrier because it was his fault. "Shut up, ya stinker. You don't know what it's like down there. . . . But that ain't fair, Mis' Cooley. That stinker didn't have nothin' to do with it."

"He left the Shelter, didn't he?"

"No, I mean yes, but look. I took him out. I was gonna bring him back, honest I was, Mis' Cooley. I just took him fer a good time. He ain't never even had orange pop. Don't send him up, Mis' Cooley. Them delinks down there'd murder him. You hadn't oughta send him down there. Put it on my record. Say I made him go with me, willya, Mis' Cooley?"

"Aw, Jimmie, I wanna go with you. You could take care of me," Dave pleaded, the tears beginning to come.

"Look, ya baby. That ain't no place fer you, so cut it out. Please, Mis' Cooley, why can'tcha send him to the orphanage at least?"

"Too late for that now, Jimmie. They won't take delinquents."

"Him a delink?" Jimmie laughed scornfully. "Hell, Mis' Cooley, he ain't even growed up to be a stinker yet."

She laughed. "Stop the cursing, Jimmie." She looked at him hard and in a way that made him feel uneasy, as though she could see what he didn't want to say. "One thing I can't understand. Why should you care what happens to Dave? You never cared about anybody as long as I've known you."

"Hell . . . I'm sorry, Mis' Cooley. I mean I don't care, but take a look at him. He ain't got nothin' on his bones an' he shakes all the time when he gets scared. Look at his hands. He ain't got enough to tickle a guy with in a scrap. He's got to have somebody take care of him. He ain't never gonna make a good delink. He—he even got a doll. Doncha see, Mis' Cooley, he ——" Jimmie stopped in shocked surprise. It was getting hard to talk. There was a lump in his throat. He felt his eyes burn. He was going to cry. Like a stinker, he was going to cry!

Mrs. Cooley watched him and then smiled. "I think I see, Jimmie." She got up from the desk and went to the window.

Jimmie was grateful. He didn't want her to see him crying like a stinker.

"I had a wonderful place all picked out for him too," she said from the window. "On a farm. Very nice people too. Their children are all grown up and they'd like to have somebody around."

Jimmie jumped up from his chair. "Th... it, Mis' Cooley. A farm. That's just ... thing fer him. Lots of milk an' things. Y... like a farm, Dave, with chickens an' ho... an' things. Why doncha, Mis' Cooley? ... could pin it all on me an' work it easy."

"I rather go with you, Jimmie," D... pleaded.

"Shut up afore I paste ya one," Jim... told him. "Don't listen to him, Mis' Coo... He don't know what it's like at the refo... school."

She walked back to her desk. "Mayb... could still arrange it, Jimmie, and I th... you're right. Dave does need somebody ... take care of h... That's the trou... The Johnsons wan... boy who's all gro... up, like you."

Jimmie eyed her suspiciously. "I don't get it. Me? I ain't no probation officer."

She smiled. "I know, but we could sort of make you one. We probate children—to—er—to grownups lots of times."

Dave found his voice and shrieked. "Jimmie, Jimmie, we could be on the farm together." He ran to Jimmie and pulled on his arm. "Please, Jimmie." He couldn't go on. He started blubbering and his head sank to Jimmie's lap while the sobs shook his thin shoulders. Jimmie looked down at him with disgust.

"Ya see how he is, Mis' Cooley? The stinker." He ran his hand through Dave's hair and patted him. "You ain't kiddin', Mis' Cooley?"

"I was never more serious, Jimmie."

Dave mumbled something and Jimmie yanked at his hair. "I don' want yer doll, ya little stinker." He thought about it and Dave raised his head, the tears streaming. "Oh, all right. I guess somebody got to take care of ya. Holy cow, me on a farm. Wait'll Danny hears about that." Dave gave a strangled gasp and hugged Jimmie. "Cut it out. Can the waterworks. We'll go to the farm, but you better act right. You don't get to be no delink like me, understand?"

Dave smiled while he sniffled and sobbed and shook.

"Aw, ya stinker," Jimmie said softly and smiled back at him. He felt all mushy inside. "Ain't he the stinker, though, Mis' Cooley?"

Jimmie looked up at her and didn't mind that she could see the tears in his own eyes. She was sniffling into a handkerchief herself.

THE END

The Mother

By Elizabeth-Ellen Long

There were always weed bouquets
On her tables and her stands,
Strange colorful arrangements picked
By little eager hands.

Her window sills were crowded,
And every shelf as well,
With unorthodox collections
Of leaf and rock and shell.

All her neighbors disapproved.
"Just extra work!" said they.
"Our children wouldn't dare bring home
Such trash to us each day."

But she only looked at them
With pity in her eyes
For those who couldn't recognize
True love in any guise!

You'll find more than a hint of 18th Century loveliness in this new design. Styled by Mengel... especially for your bedroom Here's furniture with a family tree.

Look at the graceful lines...classically simple, simply beautiful. Notice the rich lustre of the ribbon-striped veneers of genuine Gold Coast mahogany and selected cabinet hardwoods... the delicate applique design . . . the satin-finished period hardware.

Truly, this is furniture any 18th Century craftsman could be proud of.

Yet there's an important touch of today. Each one of the 16 pieces can be used alone . . . or combined with others to give you just what you need.

It's all-room furniture, too. Make a bookcase group for your living room . . . a roomy vanity for your bedroom . . . a smart buffet for your dinette. (Yes, there are matching table and chairs.) Your Mengel store will be glad to suggest combinations to meet your every need.

And every piece is *Permanized. That's Mengel's name for their exclusive, scientific method of furniture construction. In any climate . . . hot or cold, damp or dry . . . the joints and veneers will never come apart.

Permanized MENGEL Furniture

Don't fail to see this lovely, traditional but functional furniture. You'll love its graceful charm. And, if you're looking for something just a little more modern . . . ask your Mengel store to show you the Moon Beige Suite. Same fine mahogany, same striking design . . . in a beautiful blonde finish.

Can Your Bedfast Child Amuse Himself?

By Jeannette Eyerly

A WAIL comes from Sally's bedroom: "What can I do now, mommie? I'm tired of coloring!" Mother, for the third time that morning, wipes the dishwater from her hands and climbs the stairs. Sally, now enduring her third day in bed with a cold, is not only tired of coloring; she is tired of playing with clay, she is tired of cutting out pictures from the magazines. What Sally really wants is for mother to come in and sit by her bed the way she did the first day when she was really sick. But unfortunately, mother has work to do, and as mother works Sally wails, "What can I do now?"

The next time you have a bedfast child, take stock of what you have on hand, and the kitchen is the best place to start. The chances are that your child will be more diverted by the improvised playthings than he will be by something you could purchase at a store.

Here are some of the things that have diverted my children, sick or well, through the ages two to eight:

No manufacturer has yet devised a toy that a small child (two to five) will enjoy any more than your cooky-making or cake-decorating set. It presents fine opportunities for screwing on the different end patterns and moving the plunger up and down. All your other cooky cutters are choice play materials too. They may be drawn around to make Christmas trees, rabbits, chickens or hearts. If you are not sensitive to mess, a wad of clay, a rolling pin and a half dozen cooky cutters will give an imaginative child a full morning's entertainment.

A box of macaroni is another good improvised plaything. The pieces are first broken into interesting lengths, then colored with crayons and strung on gay-colored yarns.

A small child will enjoy playing with a set of nesting plastic measuring cups. A large needle, a length of thread or twine and the button box is another good bet. The buttons may be strung in hit-or-miss fashion, or the child may string all the red, all the white, the black, and so on until all the buttons are used.

A back rest for a bedfast child who is allowed to sit up can be improvised from an ordinary straight-backed chair placed flat at the head of the bed and well padded with pillows.

FOR a child who is well enough to sit in a chair but is still not allowed to be on his feet, a workable desk can be arranged by placing the breadboard across the arms of any Lawson-type chair.

During convalescence my children have made miles of paper chains either cut from colored paper (if on hand) or made from strips of white paper which have been colored.

Of course, many of these diversions are extremely messy, but the time comes in every mother's life when a period of uninterrupted work is worth the few minutes spent in cleaning up a mess.

For the child who is to be confined to bed for a long time the amusements I have listed will, quite naturally, become old after a few days. But there are other more lasting possibilities. The father of a child with rheumatic fever made a small bird-feeding tray which was placed outside the sick child's window. Crumbs were placed there daily, and before long there were dozens of small feathered visitors making their pearance.

An ingenious mother of my acquaint planted a window garden for a small c The plants never achieved any great but the small seedlings with their diffe characteristics were interesting to wa During the winter months she plan flower and vegetable seeds in the ea filled cups of muffin pans. A slightly o child will enjoy doing the planting hims

A "FAT" carrot also provides an intere ing experiment. If the carrot came from store complete with top, this must first removed, leaving only the barest fracti Then slice off an inch or two from the n end, depending on the tapering qualities the carrot. The next step is to hollow out inch or two with an apple corer or kn (the deeper the better) from the cut e Bore two small holes on either side of t "wall" and suspend the carrot by a pie of string. Fill the hole with water. Wit a few days, if you are faithful about wat ing, the carrot will sprout feathery gre leaves again.

A "Cinderella" garden is both instru tive and fun to watch. The ingredients a one large clinker, six or eight inches in d ameter, and several smaller ones; a cup salt; two cups of water; a low flat bowl; an a few drops of coloring.

The clinkers are first covered with wat and allowed to soak for several hours, the rinsed thoroughly. They are then placed i the bowl, the large one first, then th smaller ones to form towers. Mix the wate and salt together and pour over the clinker The liquid in the bowl should be about a inch deep. Put single drops of bluing mercurochrome or water colors in differen spots on the clinkers. In a day or two sal crystals will begin to form on the castle an on the inside of the bowl. Most of them wil be white, but a few will be tinted. The crys tals on the towers should "grow" about an inch. A mixture of more water and salt can be added as the water evaporates from the bowl.

Although it requires a little preparation to make a "sick" box during the period when a child is well, it is worth the time spent when illness comes. Save all small boxes that come your way until you have seven. Fill them with such things as old bridge tallies, gaily colored wrapping pa pers, empty perfume bottles, and pieces of cardboard.

For example, here are some of the items that went into our Monday box: a half-dozen Christmas and birthday cards; sev eral small pieces of lace; milk-bottle top and string to make "spinners"; button and scraps of material; a pack of old play ing cards.

The possibilities are endless. Each house affords its own treasures. After the box has been exhausted it is refilled and put away for another time.

Pediatricians say that a child should stay in bed twenty-four hours after tempera ture is again normal, but many mothers weaken when it comes to keeping a lively child in bed for that extra day. Yet this pre caution will often ward off a recurring tem perature or unsuspected relapse. So it pays to have a handful of tricks not up your sleeve, but in kitchen cupboards and sewing drawer. They will help toward a quick re covery and a healthy child. THE END

"That first day... whew!"

I've taken quite a beating—visiting my sister and her game-warden husband here in Colorado. That first day—whew! Tales about grizzly bears. Warnings that my loud shirt would scare the trout. And when I snagged my blue jeans, you can bet there was plenty of chat about "city dudes"!

In the evening, not even the tallest tales could keep me awake. But my eyes flew wide open when Sis led me to my bunk. "And you call me a dude!" I gasped, staring at smooth, snowy sheets. "What's more, I do believe they're percale—you great big backwoods plutocrat!"

"Yuh got me," Sis drawled, grinning. "Even in these parts, we kinda go for luxurious sleeping. Those beauties you're admiring are Cannon Percale Sheets, Pet—and we don't have to trap ermine to afford 'em. They cost only a little more than heavy-duty muslin!"

"Even if YOU end up in a penthouse," she went on, "you'll do well to remember these words. Feel how fine-woven these Cannon Percales are? Nice and light for bed-making and laundering! As for wear—they're downright marvels!" "Okay," I murmured, snuggling down. "Cannon Percales sound wonderful—but right now they soothe me to sleep even better!"

WAIT FOR ME DARLING

She thrust her arms through the sleeves of her wrap-around dress and realized detachedly that this might be the last time she would have to wear it. Todd came in and tied the laces of her sturdy, flat-heeled shoes.

She wandered restlessly through the apartment while he dressed. She looked in at the blue-and-white nursery-to-be. Everything was in its place, waiting. Blue for boys. It had to be a boy. If she must go through this wretched, vulgar process, at least let it be a boy. Men lived such wonderfully easy, uncluttered lives.

The pain came again, like a knot this time, pulling tighter and tighter. She clutched at the back of the blue-chintz chair.

"Todd," she called, "hurry!"

He came out of their bedroom almost running, her suitcase in one hand, her coat over his arm.

The streets were empty. Todd held her arm as they walked to the corner looking for a cab. I hope we don't find one, she thought. I hope we don't find one for ages.

Todd found one. He helped her in and she sat frozenly, looking out at the gray winter morning. She shivered. Other women wanted their babies, loved them before they were born. Why must it be different for her? She was shuddering again, every fiber in her pulling back, wanting escape.

The cab pulled over to the curb and they were there. The sun was just coming up, cutting the morning mist, but the hospital looked cold and forbidding. They went into the clean, bright vestibule and she waited while Todd registered for her. He held her hand in his warm one as they went up in the elevator. The corridor was stuffy and smelled of antiseptic. Jane felt her forehead grow damp with nervousness.

St. Francis of Assisi, hoeing his garden, was asked what he would do if he were suddenly to learn that he was to die at sunset that day. He said, "I would finish hoeing my garden."

There was a nurse waiting for them, and a small, bare room with its high, metal hospital bed. Todd waited outside while the nurse unpacked the suitcase and helped Jane into bed.

"Where's Doctor Christie?" Jane asked.

"He'll be here right away," the nurse said briskly.

Jane waited. Todd came in and sat by the bed in a stiff-backed chair. I ought to say something, Jane thought. Something noble, or tender—or just something. But she couldn't think of anything. This was it. The last split second before the plunge, the timelessness that lay before the end and the beginning. There were no words to say. She waited quietly, holding Todd's hand, not looking at his pale, anxious face. The awful quivering had stopped. She didn't have any pains now; perhaps it had all been a false alarm. She wondered if anything had gone wrong. Maybe there was something wrong with the baby. Maybe God was going to punish her for being such a coward.

THERE were quick, firm steps in the hall. Doctor Christie came in, fresh and crisp in his short-sleeved white jacket, smiling at them reassuringly.

"Well, Jane," said Doctor Christie, "so you stole a march on me, eh?"

As though on cue the pain started again. It washed over her, drowning her. She tried to speak, but her throat closed over.

They sent Todd away and she was alone with the strange, starched nurse and Doctor Christie. But Doctor Christie looked different now. She watched his face as he spoke to the nurse. He had ceased being the genial, fatherly consultant who scolded her for gaining weight and knew all about the sudden attacks of nervousness and the leg cramps that crippled her at unexpected moments. This was another man: distant, impersonal, with a job to do. He was in league with the nurse and between them they held life and death—her life, her death—in their capable, scrubbed hands.

The pain came at her with a lunge knot tightening, contracting, until thought her very flesh would be cru Panic seared along her nerves. She se teeth and waited. The knot loosened sl reluctantly.

"Doctor Christie!"

He looked down at her, a faint frow tween his brows, as though annoyed at interruption. She wanted to pull at sleeve, to make him realize that this she—Jane Ainslee Sutton—and did he t she was impervious to pain?

"You promised to give me somethi she said.

His frown deepened. "Now, Jane, take it easy. This is a perfectly nor delivery. Later on ——"

"No!" She heard her voice rising, wondered if Todd could hear, out in hall. But she didn't care. "You promis You said if it got really bad ——"

He looked at her for a long moment. wasn't going to give her anything! He going to let her go on suffering.

This is the oldest agony in the world, thought. And yet I'm here enduring it. Wh What kind of mother will I be to a child I do love? How could I possibly love it after th

She looked back at him, wordless. turned finally and said something to t nurse. Jane waited. Doctor Christ touched her hand, his fingers on her wri

"All right," he sa kindly. "There's nothi to be so frightened of."

The nurse was bac standing by the bed wi a long, shining hypode mic. Jane closed her eye She felt the cool prickli of alcohol on her upper ar and the blessed sting the needle going throug her skin. She smiled u at the doctor because he was her frien again.

But then the pain came, dividing them She stiffened to take up the shock and waite for the drug to work. . . . There was some thing wrong; it wasn't working. How ha she trusted him? Now there were three o them against her: the doctor, the nurse an the pain. Nothing could conquer the pain.

"It doesn't work," she insisted foggily.

But even before her eyes were fully open she was aware of change. The room was darkened, with a thin circle of light near the head of her bed. She had a vague remembrance of voices, movement, and the rubbery smell of . . .. was it ether? She raised her curiously heavy hands and touched her waist. Flat. Her baby had been born.

"Hello," said the nurse. Jane turned her head. "Do you know you have a baby boy?"

Jane looked up at the smiling, faintly tired face. She smiled back. "Where's Todd?" she asked huskily.

"He's telephoning." said the nurse. "I'll tell him you're awake."

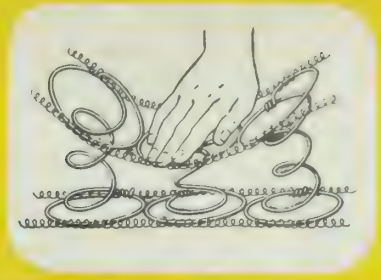
Jane waited, watching the door. She felt fine, and light enough to float right off the bed. It was wonderful, having herself to herself again. Todd was leaning over her.

"A boy," she said, smiling.

The drug was still working, pulling her back into dreamlessness, but even through the haziness she could see the glory in his face. His eyes were glowing. He turned her hand palm up and leaned his head against it.

"A wonderful boy," he said. "Blue eyes. Handsome. Oh, Janie ——"

But she didn't hear the rest, floating away and out into sleep.



She woke late, refreshed and contented. It was delightful to lie quietly and know there was absolutely nothing in the world to get up for. Was this all there was to having a baby? Imagine having a painless baby! All that agony blotted out. It made her feel quite triumphant, outwitting the pain. And a boy, too, she thought happily, feeling slightly sorry for mothers of girls. Why didn't they bring him in? She rang for the floor nurse.

"I haven't seen my baby yet," she said.

"They're bringing them out now," said the nurse. "The baby wagon comes around at ten."

She waited, suddenly nervous. How silly to be upset over seeing one's own baby. My goodness, she thought with a sense of shock, I'm a mother now. But it was a steadying thought. Mother love was as automatic as breathing; as soon as she held her baby in her arms everything would be all right.

The wagon trundled down the hall and stopped across from her door. She could see the capped, masked nurse trotting down the corridor, a tiny squealing bundle tucked securely under each arm. She hurried in and deposited one on Jane's bed.

"Baby boy, Sutton," she said, and went out again.

Jane looked down apprehensively. Such a small bundle. She saw two round, blue eyes and a thin fuzz of hair. Any moment now she would be warm with loving him. Her heart would open out to him.

"David," she said tentatively. "David Paul Sutton."

David looked through her and beyond her. He wriggled in the blanket. One arm came loose and she saw the blue-beaded identification bracelet on his fat little wrist. She marveled at the fan of fingers, the knuckle creases, the minute nails. She undid the bottom of the blanket and examined the fringe of toes. He kicked out at her with surprising strength and she recognized the feel of it against her hand.

"Hello, David," she said, waiting.

But David opened his toothless, satiny mouth and began to cry. She patted his hand placatingly. The wails increased. His face turned dark red. He held his breath.

"Nurse!" screamed Jane, terrified.

The nurse came in, unhurried. "Had enough for the first time?" she asked.

"He's turning purple! What's the n with him?"

"Just temper. What did you unpin for?"

"I wanted to see his toes," said Jan

She watched the deft hands pin u bottom of the blanket. David start breathe again, sobbing furiously. The picked him up unceremoniously and c him away.

Jane listened to the baby wagon trun down the hall. Something was ter wrong. She had seen her baby, she had through it all safely and held him in arms, and . . . she had felt nothing. W had happened? This was the moment she longed for. The moment that was to have worth all the waiting, the inconvenience, suffering. Her mind snagged at the thought: the suffering. How many times she heard women say, "But you love y baby because of the pain"? Because of pain? But she had felt no pain. The ho she had dreaded so violently had been ta out of her life. She had no recollection them. And now, when they brought t strange, outraged infant to her, he was part of her. What had she done in her d picable cowardice? What did the pain mat compared with this empty unfeelingnes Better to have suffered and loved her ba She closed her eyes and for the moment s felt only numbness. What have I done? s asked herself.

Almost she could have enjoyed her t days in the hospital. The luxury of ju staying in bed, the smiling visitors, t dainty, utterly adorable little gifts. But ru ning through it all, the one dark thread in pastel tapestry, was the bitter, irrevocab knowledge of her own guilt. How could sh be a good mother to a child she did not love She had cheated an innocent, helpless huma being, traded his birthright for her own com fort. Why hadn't she been as brave as othe mothers? For the first time she felt sh understood them. They had battled an Doctor Christie recommended a good se: Mrs. Barrows, plump, good-natured capable. Jane liked her as soon as she her. Even David seemed to like her. He quietly on her lap during the ride home, king soft, contented noises. Jane sat in front seat and kept one eye on David and on Todd, who was driving as though he a basket of eggs in the back.

"I don't want to jounce him," he ex- ined in a hoarse undertone. "He might to be afraid of the car."

Mrs. Barrows chortled. "Don't worry, . Sutton," she said. "He won't break."

There are three ways to drown your sorrows—in the bottle, in tears and in increased activity. The last is the surest way to survive the deluge. —AUGUSTA DOCKERY.

Todd carried his son upstairs. David went to sleep in his brand-new crib with his father bending anxiously over the slatted railing and getting underfoot until Mrs. Barrows banished him from the nursery.

Jane stretched out in the wide bed. The ride had tired her and she was grateful for the softness of her own down pillows and thick quilt. She listened to Mrs. Barrows mixing formula in the kitchen and felt strangely lonesome and forlorn. Todd came in and grinned at her.

"Mighty glad to see you home again," he said. "Guess I've outgrown my bachelor days." He drew her close. "It's good to be alone with you for a change."

Jane pulled away. If there was nothing in her heart for David, then there could be nothing for Todd. They were part of each other and each canceled the other out.

"What is it?"

There was a loud demanding wail from the nursery.

"The baby's up," Jane said hastily.

Mrs. Barrows brought him in. "Will you give him his bottle, Mrs. Sutton?" she asked. "I don't like to leave the formula in the middle."

Jane held the bottle to the eager little mouth. She glanced up at Todd. He was watching his son, one hand just touching the tiny fingers. He felt her eyes on him and raised his head.

"You look beautiful, Janie," he said softly. "So—well, so right, holding him."

She glanced away, afraid to let him see her face because there was no response in it.

But there was no time to think too much about herself. With so many unfamiliar tasks to learn, the days skittered by. She mixed formula and scrubbed bottles, she hemmed crib sheets and folded diapers. But th baby remained alien to her. It was str ge, considering how capable she was, th she could not do the simplest things co ctly for David. She was nervous about fe ng him, sure he would choke on the bo e. And his bath, which Mrs. Barrows ac nplished in fifteen efficient minutes, wa a watery torture to Jane. Soap might ge n his eyes and blind him. The soft de- pr sion on the top of his head frightened her wi its slowly beating pulse. She was always af d she might hurt him with her clumsi- ne , afraid he could sense the coldness in the to h of her hands. She worked hard. If she co d not love him, then she must make up fo t by caring for him to the best of her ab ty.

odd didn't think she was clumsy. He w ld stand by the crib, marveling at her. "You're a born mother," he said. "You lo as though you'd been doing this all your lif " ane tied the strings on David's under- sh t and slipped a waving arm into the sl ve of his gown. She bit down on her to gue to keep from lashing out at Todd. H w could he be so blind? Quick fingers did n make a good mother. It was what she fe inside that mattered! And I don't feel a thing, she mourned silently.

Lately there were always sharp words re dy on her tongue. She was tired all the ti e. The household centered rigidly around th baby's schedule, and innumerable details cl ched at her: David needed more re- ving blankets; the milk order must be in- sed again; the doctor had to be consulted ut the baby's rash—was he allergic to nge juice?—the laundress was complain- ing about the size of the wash. Sometimes she felt as though she traveled an endless treadmill.

Her heavy sense of guilt was always be- tween her and Todd, intangible, suffocating, ever-present. Couldn't he see the weight she was struggling under? In a way he was re- sponsible for it. If he hadn't insisted on having David she would never have known this lack in herself, never yearned for the happiness that was granted other women. She was both grateful for and irritated by his lack of perception. His unquestioning indifference made her every action a lie, separating them. She missed the understanding they had shared, and knew he did too. She longed for the old, comfortable ways, when they had known each other's thoughts al- most without words, when even their differences had been unimportant because they could settle them with a kiss, a glance or a private joke. Now there seemed to be no common ground. But she did nothing, avoiding the moments that might lead to any warmth between them. It was almost like a penance. Whatever tenderness might come to her must be for David. Her first obliga- tion was to him. Frustration made her sharp, and often the words leaped out before she could catch them.

"You could be a little more pleasant," Todd said, when she had curtly refused his offer of dinner downtown and an evening at the theater.

"I just said I didn't want to go! I'm too tired." Why couldn't she keep quiet? In a little while they'd be snapping at each other like two strange dogs.

He hesitated, troubled. "Is anything wrong, Jane? You've been a little off the beam lately."

"No! Don't fuss at me."

"All right." He settled down and left her glaring miserably at the cover of his book.

They went to bed amidst a polite silence. Jane tossed restlessly while Todd slept. His even breathing exasperated her—how could he be so unfeeling? She fell asleep and dreamed vague, wild dreams that turned to nightmare. She wrestled frantically with the bedclothes and woke to a crescendo of screams. Todd was sitting up, shaking her.

"Listen," he said. "There's something wrong with the baby."

She sat up. The screams sounded piercingly through two closed doors. Todd was out of bed, groping for his slippers. Jane ran down the hall. The nursery was empty and she opened the kitchen door. Mrs. Barrows was busy at the stove, wrapped in an old flannel robe, her gray hair pinned in ringlets. David lay across her shoulder, tiny fists beating at her neck, his face contorted.

"What is it?" gasped Jane.

Mrs. Barrows patted David soothingly. "Colic," she said. "Just plain, old-fashioned colic. I made him a hot-water bottle and I'm warming some drinking water for him."

Jane stood by helplessly. "But it hurts him dreadfully," she said. "Shouldn't we call the doctor?"

"You can if you want. But there's no sense bothering him. I've seen enough colic in my day. It's like a cramp they get and there's nothing in the world to do for it but keep them warm and soothe them. I don't like these newfangled medicines—they weaken a child." She sat down and began to rock back and forth. "Go on to bed, Mrs. Sutton," she said. "That's what you've got me for. He'll be all right. I've seen plenty worse than this—real colicky babies that'll wear you out. This isn't anything."

They went back to bed finally, ears straining toward the kitchen. The screams became more infrequent, subsided into hiccups, and then they heard Mrs. Barrows taking him back to his crib. Jane shivered and curled against Todd's warm body. He put a comforting arm around her shoulders and fell asleep.

Thank God for Mrs. Barrows, Jane thought. What a terrible responsibility a child was. There were so many things a mother had to know. Did other mothers know them intuitively because they loved their babies? She sighed unhappily in the darkness and looked down dreary years. Was the rest of her life to be geared to this barren reluctance, this profitless burden?

She was up early the next morning. It was a bleak day with gray skies and a hint of snow in the air. In the nursery David was surveying the ceiling thoughtfully, as round, as rosy as ever.

"I wish he'd smile at me," Jane said wistfully.

Todd struggled into his overcoat. "He ll," he said. He gave her a quick morning ss and the front door slammed.

Jane wandered through the apartment, eling lost. The cleaning woman came and ft. Mrs. Barrows gave David his noon ttle and turned him over for his nap.

"Mrs. Sutton," she said, at the living-om door, "I'd like to go out. I need some ings and I'd better do my shopping before ie snow starts."

Jane frowned. "Will you be gone long?" ie asked.

"A few hours anyway," said Mrs. Bar-ows. "But the baby won't give you any rouble. He's all over it."

"All right," said Jane reluctantly.

After Mrs. Barrows left she went to the itchen and checked the bottles. They were ined up in the refrigerator, looking very rim and sterile. The squat little water bot-le stood on the work counter with a glass ap over the nipple. There were fresh diapers n a neat pile on the ursery bureau. No, she shouldn't have any trouble. And Mrs. Barrows would be back in plenty of time for his bath. She saw the first thin flakes of snow drifting down and went to the window to watch.

There was a low, muffled sound from the nursery. Was the baby awake? She tip-toed across the kitch-en and looked in. David was lying face down, his little knees pulled up almost un-der his stomach. He was crying softly, rubbing his nose against the sheet.

"There, there," she said, patting him gently.

He was wet. She turned him over and took a diaper from the bureau. The pins were new and very sharp and she stuck her finger twice, al-most in the same spot.

David wailed in a thin, steady voice.

He can't be hungry, Jane thought. And I've just changed him.

She got another blanket and covered him carefully. The wailing settled to a deeper key and went on monotonously. She wrapped him in the blanket and picked him up, fum-bling a little, one hand under his round head, the other supporting his spine. She walked back and forth across the room, patting him, and the movement seemed to soothe him. But when she put him back in his crib he started to squirm again.

Perhaps he wanted water. She was in the kitchen uncapping the water bottle when he began to scream. There was no mistaking it now. It was the same furious, painful cry she had heard last night. Colic! she thought, racing for the nursery.

WHEN she picked him up she could feel him draw together into a tense little ball. What should she do? Why hadn't she stayed in the kitchen last night? She remembered the kettle on the stove. Hot water. Hot-water bottle! She carried him inside with her, the blanket trailing. There was water in the kettle; all she had to do was to turn on the flame. While it was heating she walked back and forth, patting him, murmuring to him, "Poor David. Poor little David." He twisted in her arms, wiry and unheeding.

When the kettle was steaming she had to put him back in the crib while she filled the rubber bag. It was too hot to hold and she wrapped it in a heavy towel. David was screaming steadily. She turned him on his side and held the toweled bundle against his stomach.

But it gave him no relief. She went back to the kitchen; it was warmer there and cozier, close to the stove. She sat on the hard wooden chair and rocked back and forth, holding him tightly against her. He sobbed in her ear, his tiny hands clenched, his toes pulling at her blouse as he kicked.

"Poor little Davy," she said, her throat tight with pity. "Poor little Davy; mother's sorry."

HE quieted slightly and she thought he responded to the sound of her voice. She talked softly to him. When her throat got dry she began to hum, rocking steadily to the rhythm. She rocked him for a long time, until her arms were heavy with his weight and her back felt ready to snap. Why don't we have a rocking chair? she thought. Every house should have a rocking chair! She straightened up, easing her back.

David began to cry again. She offered him some water and he drank greedily. Her ears rang in the sud-den silence. But as soon as he had fin-ished he screamed.

She gathered him up. Poor little thing. He didn't know what it was all about. He was trying to tell her it hurt! Her eyes smarted with sym-pathy and she felt closer to him than she ever had before. She got another blanket, warmed it near the stove and wrapped it around him, tucking it under his feet. He seemed to curl into the warmth, his face a tightly wrinkled oval, his eyes squeezed shut. She rewarmed his water bottle and let him drink some more. How perfectly he fit-ted into her arms, his head secure in the bend of her elbow, his body resting so trustfully against her. How appealing he was.

He moved his head and some of the water spilled on her blouse. Her shoulders ached and her head was be-ginning to throb. She started rocking again, each thrust of her body sending a jab of pain deep into her back. But this time she could not soothe him. He screamed against the low monotone of her voice. He shrilled violently, in a paroxysm of pain.

Pity gave way to fright. How could one small body hold all that pain? Each sharp, agonized cry dug into her brain. He was writhing on her lap, beating at her, his legs rigid. The veins stood out on his forehead and it took all her strength to keep him from slipping to the floor. How long had he been screaming? How much time had gone by? Her arm was beneath him and she could not see her watch. She wondered if she should call the doctor. Perhaps this wasn't colic at all. He might be going into convulsions.

He can't stand this much longer, she thought. He'll hurt himself!

Suddenly uneasy, she patted him sharply on the back. The ear-splitting shrieking con-tinued, the veins became more pronounced. She felt swallowed up by fear. He would burst a blood vessel and die! Her hands began to tremble.

I didn't want him, she thought starkly. Isn't that the same as wishing him dead?

This was her fault. This was her punish-ment. A baby needed more than food and shelter. He needed warmth and love to make him strong. How selfish she had been. She had given him no comfort, she had denied

Ana Cutting Bread

BY YETZA GILLESPIE

She spread the butter on the good rye bread Richly, and laughed, and put a slice in each
Of the small outstretched hands, and suddenly
The kitchen walls had vanished in a reach
Of rye, wind-rippled field of sunny grain
Crooning beneath the promise of the sun,
Cupping the bright notes of the harvester
Like the soft echo of a thing well done.
She put the knife down with a little clatter.
The walls closed in, the fire burned up red,
And we were all together in the kitchen,
With Ana laughing, buttering our bread.

him and now he was going to die. Whatever happened to him was on her own head. Was this what she had turned from? This tiny, hurting being who cried to her? His small strength could be snuffed out in the blink of an eye. The enormity of it was too much to face.

"Oh, God," she said, "he's so little. He hasn't had a chance yet. Please, God!"

Perspiration prickled down her back. Had she resented this tiny, perfect body, the curving forehead, the wide-apart eyes that were Todd's in miniature, the tilted nose, the round button of a mouth? This was part of herself. For a timeless moment she looked at herself in the welter of noise, heat and fare and shivered in disgust. This was her son, this squalling, fighting, living scrap of humanity, so small, so endearingly helpless.

She clasped him close against her throat in a passion of tenderness. If only he could be as safe again as in the months before he had been born. But the miracle was not in birth, but in life. She wanted to watch him grow; his baby eyes had a whole, round world to see. There was no time for self-reproach. Strength was flowing into her. She wouldn't let him die. If the pain didn't stop in a few minutes she would call the hospital.

Her hands stopped shaking. She got the hot-water bottle and spilled most of it into the sink, working awkwardly with one hand. When it was almost flat she corked it, covered it with a towel and laid it across her knees. Then she turned David face down above it, the bottle directly under his stomach. She held him down, hooked her heels on the rung of the chair and swung her knees from side to side. She fought his pain, willing it away.

"Don't cry, Davy. Mother's here. Don't cry any more. Please, Davy. Please, God!"

Her whole body felt liquid with yearning. A tide of warm, anxious loving went through her, from her heart to her fingertips.

She worked doggedly, her legs aching. The underside of the towel had slipped and she could feel the hot rubber against her skin, but she was afraid to move. His screams were quieting. The warmth soothed him and slowly his face relaxed, the purple-red receding a little. Tight little muscles smoothed themselves out. He opened his eyes.

Never before had she known such relief. It thrilled through her veins.

He whimpered softly. His little hands fell open, small fingers spreading fanwise. His head drooped across her knee and she could feel the flutter of his breath. The pain eased. She thought she could sense its absence through the ends of her fingers.

His eyes closed. He slept, exhausted, round face angelic. Jane sat still; ach grateful tears pouring down her cheeks.

"Oh, my darling," she said in the si kitchen. "My little pink lamb."

Like a dreamer coming slowly out of sl she heard the tinny ticking of the clock the nursery. The snow had stopped, leav a thin, white crust on the window sill. J looked down at the baby sleeping on lap and sighed tiredly. She had battled him. She had earned him.

She was free again. The heavy load she had carried was gone, dissolved. The burden had slipped from her shoulders to her waiting arms.

How much time she had wasted. Todd had felt all along as she felt now. Poor, sweet, patient Todd. How good he had been, reassuring her, believing in her. Well, he had been right. She was a good mother. She could feel it in her bones.

Darling, she thought remorsefully, I'll make your favorite dinner, and pin a bow in my hair, and then we'll sit in the big chair by the radio and talk and we'll really be together again. She pillowed her head on her arm, her chin just grazing the baby's head. He wriggled, burrowing against her, and she smiled, fighting off sleep. Mothers are made, not born! she thought. Oh, Todd, darling, wait for me. I'll learn. I'll grow up to it.

There are no public hearings on divorce in Sweden. The partners need not appear in person in a public court. If both parties desire divorce they are entitled to it, as they were to be married in the first place. No final divorce is granted until there has been an official attempt at mediation, however. One year of separation, during which time neither party may marry, precedes the final decree. . . . If the wife has more money than the husband, she can be made to pay alimony, especially if he is in poor health. Immediate divorce is granted if the two have lived apart for at least three years, or for willful desertion for at least two years. Other causes for immediate divorce are adultery, bigamy, assault and battery, imprisonment for at least three years or incurable insanity. . . . If a divorced wife remarries she automatically forfeits any alimony. Each party is entitled to property he or she brought to the household or acquired by gift or inheritance. The wife receives a half share in whatever her husband earned during the marriage.

CHICKEN-CORN SOUP

Combine 2 cans condensed cream of chicken soup with 1 cup canned whole-kernel corn chopped fine, or 1 cup fresh corn cut from the cob. Add 2 cups milk and ½ cup water. Season with ¼ teaspoon salt, a pinch of poultry seasoning, a good dash of pepper and a few drops of hot pepper sauce. Simmer over low heat until the flavors blend. If fresh corn is used, simmer until tender in the ½ cup water before adding the milk and condensed chicken soup. Serve hot, garnished with paprika.

Gossip item. You've heard of the woman who went to a stylish and elaborate luncheon. When her young daughter asked her what, very special, they had to eat, she said, "Well, I don't really know what it was but it was kinda cute."

That is not the case of the deviled wheat wafers which we will serve with the soup. These will impress themselves on you and your guests and be a pretty popular number with one and all.

DEVILED WHEAT WAFERS

Cream until soft 3 tablespoons butter or margarine. Add ½ teaspoon dry mustard, ¼ teaspoon paprika and ½ teaspoon Worcestershire sauce. This will spread 18 shredded-wheat wafers. Toast in a moderate oven, 350° F., about 3 minutes, or until they are hot and a little brown. These may be made ahead and set aside, but pile them loosely. Spread things are candidates for complete separation.

These crackers are splendid with any corn or vegetable soup and perfect with salad, so you can't go wrong by doing right.

RICE

WITH NEW FOOD VALUE, WITH GRAINS THAT STAND APART, WITH NEW COOKING EASE, WITH NEW DELICIOUS FLAVOR

Chicken fricassee tastes better with the wonderful flavor of Uncle Ben's. Or try this new rice in . . .

- Spanish Rice
- Rice Pudding
- Curried Shrimps
- Salt Pork and Gravy

Fluffy rice every time this easy way: 1 cup Uncle Ben's Rice; 2¼ cups boiling water; 1 teaspoon salt. Cook in covered saucepan over low heat until water is absorbed (about 22 minutes). No rinsing, no steaming. Yield: approximately 4 cups of light, fluffy rice.

Process exclusive in this country with Uncle Ben's

Nothing that has ever happened to rice since the world began eating it has stirred up so much talk as the new Uncle Ben's Converted Long Grain Rice.

We get letters from people all over the country telling how they drive twenty miles to get it—mail it to friends—give it to their neighbors.

. . . and all this happened because scientists found out how to seal into polished rice B vitamins that used to be polished off.

Always Cooks White and Fluffy

Even Southern women, famous for fluffy rice, find they can get better results from Uncle Ben's with half the trouble. And how they appreciate its nutritional value, which the great rice-eating South never had before in a polished rice.

Actually, no one can fail with Uncle Ben's. It always cooks up white and fluffy—is never sticky—never gummy. Each grain stands alone, apart, separate.

Famous Restaurants Serve It

People who thought rice too much trouble now are serving Uncle Ben's all the time, often as an alternate for potatoes. Famous restaurants, like Chicago's Pump Room, choose it for its flavor and nice appearance.

It is ideal for overseas packages—every grain weevil-proof, even in hot, damp weather.

Your grocer should have Uncle Ben's Converted Long Grain Rice now. If not, ask him to get it for you.

Going west. Pretty virile they are out there "Deep in the Heart of Texas" and other points on the map. Just witness the wonders they perform, the women as well as the men. Why, take the way they ride horses alone. It's enough to make your mind reel. Horsemanship, they call it, and it begins with the small fry and continues on up. They may skip Euclid, but they achieve the silver-studded belts and the trimmed leather boots.

A Western chop—or more. They also have ways with food. Take pork chops, baked potatoes, stuffed tomatoes for a meal on the ranch or in the finest homes, and you'll see how simple it all is and how hearty and how downright good.

BAKED PORK CHOPS

Select large loin chops, cut thick. Better allow more than one apiece if you intend to be really Western in your hospitality. Season well on both sides with salt and pepper. Dredge with flour. Brown well on both sides in hot fat. As you fry them, drain and arrange in roasting pan. Peel and cut medium onions into pieces and see that all chops have onion tucked in the pan near them. Add 1 cup water, or chicken broth if you have it, and bake in a moderate oven 1½ hours until very tender and well done. Uncover in the last half hour.

To get a new note. Strike up the band? No sirree. Turn on a music machine? Not for the new note I'm talking about. Play some boogie-woogie on the old rattletrap? You might spare us that. After all, we are friends and neighbors and shall march to our polling places together, I hope. And be sure I meet you there.

What I do mean. My new note refers to baked potatoes, no less, and I hope you'll go Western or any other direction, so long as you make

BAKED POTATOES, WESTERN STYLE

Bake potatoes as usual—in same oven and at same oven temperature as the pork chops and the baked tomatoes. Large potatoes take a good hour, so calculate your time to put them in the oven. A baked potato is easily spoiled. When done, make crisscrosses with a sharp knife on top of each potato and pop them open. They may have their own ideas as to how they look best. They don't have to look alike, but they should be open, for the idea of this dish is that you pass a bowl of chopped onion or scallions and a bowl of cheese sauce with the potatoes. Everyone helps himself to sauce and the chopped onion. Have a lot of both.

CHEESE SAUCE

Melt ¼ cup bacon fat. Blend in 6 tablespoons flour and ¼ teaspoon dry mustard. Add 3 cups milk gradually, cook and stir until thickened and smooth. Add 1 cup diced sharp American cheese. Season with pepper and 1 teaspoon salt. Heat until cheese is melted. Sauce may be made ahead and reheated in top of double boiler when you are ready to serve dinner. But like most things, it's best served piping hot right off the kettle's lip.

One more for your list. There are many variations of the stuffed-tomato dish. I don't know, really, whether this particular recipe ever saw the West or the South or where its home once was. I know it abides among the things I am fond of. And so I pass it along to you.

BAKED STUFFED TOMATOES

Cut a slice off the top of 6 large ripe tomatoes. Scoop out the centers of the tomatoes with a spoon or a melon-ball scoop. Chop fine and drain. Fry 6 slices bacon until crisp. Drain; save out 2 slices for garnish and break the rest up. Mix the crumbled bacon with the chopped tomato, ¾ cup drained crushed pineapple, bacon fat left from frying the bacon, ¼ cup chopped parsley and 1⅓ cups crushed corn flakes. Season mixture with 1 teaspoon salt, ⅛ teaspoon pepper and ½ teaspoon grated onion. Mix well. Fill tomato shells. Place in a shallow baking dish with ¼ cup water in the bottom of the pan. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., 15–20 minutes or until tomatoes are cooked through—cooked but not falling to pieces, in case you get to thinking of other things, or something. Garnish with pieces of crisp bacon.

Salad of your choice. You may pick a raw-cabbage salad with any kind of dressing, mayonnaise, boiled or Russian. Coleslaw is a pretty big favorite with such a meal, and if it's good—it's good. If your choice is cauliflower, as ours is, cut cold cooked cauliflower in thin slices. Arrange on salad greens and serve with French or well-seasoned Russian dressing.

Certainly there's dessert. When the orchards in October start to smell of red-cheeked apples, they make you feel you cannot wait another little while. For apples in October are the tart and early kind. They have an applelike expression, but hardly know their mind. Few things are as delicious in the peculiar way an early apple is. And their season is ephemeral, so take them while you may. And right now is the time.

Since an apple tart—a little different from other apple tarts—engages your eye and appetite, let us hasten kitchenward (nice and cool, isn't it?) and proceed to produce this little gem, filling and all.

APPLE TART

Make up 1½ times your recipe for plain pastry—3 cups flour, 1 cup shortening, 1½ teaspoons salt, 6 tablespoons ice water. Divide dough into 4 portions. Roll each out into circles, marking and cutting into 9-inch circles. (Use the bottom of your 9-inch layer-cake pan for a marker.) Prick the rounds well with a fork. Bake on cooky sheets in hot oven, 450° F., 12–15 minutes until golden brown. Cool. Spread apple filling between layers and on top. Garnish top with whipped cream. To serve: cut in pie-shaped wedges—just as you would a layer cake. And you may make a peach tart this way just as well. This tart could be served with heavy cream, not whipped, and be even better eating to my notion.

Apple Filling: Peel, core and slice 3 pounds (about 8 medium-size) tart apples. All the summer sun and rain have gone into the making of October apples. Look about—pick the best. Heat together 1½ cups sugar and 1½ cups water until the sugar is dissolved. Add ¾ teaspoon cinnamon and the sliced apples. Simmer, uncovered, until the apples are tender. Don't overcook them. Let them hold their shape. Add 2 tablespoons lemon juice—3 tablespoons if the apples need it. Lift the apples from the sirup and add ½ cup currant jelly. Blend 2 tablespoons cornstarch with ¼ cup cold water. Stir this into the apple sirup and cook until thickened. Now mix carefully with the apple slices and cool. And if you do right by our receipt, your apples will come out right and you'll have a good dessert.

Vermont bids welcome. I can't stand on the top of the Mollie Stark Trail this October. I have another rendezvous. But I'd love it. You drive out in the bend of the road built for folk who'd risk a ticket rather than miss what they're looking at. Here they may look in peace and no ticket will tease them.

The hills call you—you cannot know how beautiful they are. The evergreens are on the march up every sloping way, and against their deepness and mystery the maples and oaks and all the colorful trees play a symphony of color that is breath-taking. So go—if you can. It is a miracle that happens once a year—in October.

Stay as long as you can among those eternal hills, listen to their silence and watch their ever-changing pattern. There you will learn some of their mystery and drink of rare October wine. And breathe October air.

The day-by-day meals of actual housewives, cooking in their own kitchens, who have agreed to share the benefits of their experience with other JOURNAL *readers. PHOTO BY STUART

My oldest are four and six. They adore "stirring" and are learning to cook.

GENTLY does it, my pets. "Don't overcook it" will be among my first words of advice to my own girls as they come of cooking age. The simplest meals in the world—of the everyday vegetables and meats—can be a great treat if the vegetables are cooked only until a fork can penetrate them, and not one instant longer. The French call it en branche and that describes it completely—for spinach, broccoli, cauliflower and all the others. A modern pressure cooker may not be so decorative as antique copper pots and pans, but it is far more useful.

You will find no chops, steaks, ham or frying chickens in these menus. Americans are terrible snobs when it comes to what they consider the cuts of meat one just doesn't buy. Too often women "charge" meat they cannot afford to pay for.

How come every woman who cooks doesn't buy beef and chicken bouillon cubes by the dozen? I use them in everything. Lamb stew loses that flat taste and becomes delicious when you add two or three beef cubes. I toss them into every kind of gravy—and even into a white sauce when I want it a little definite in flavor. String beans need nothing added save salt when you cook them in water with a cube or two added. The clear soup in this menu is made with water from the vegetables with celery and bouillon cubes added.

SUNDAY DINNER

Clear Vegetable Soup
Roast Veal with Apricots Broccoli
Creamed Carrots and Onions
Ice Cream Beverage

Carrots and onions, as stand-bys in American cooking, are as old as the hills—but have you ever combined them? Nothing new, you say—they'd taste the same as carrots and onions served at the same meal. But do they? Cook them separately, but combine them for serving with a little white sauce, using a tablespoon each of the water they were cooked in as part of the liquid in the sauce.

Ice cream for dessert is a Sunday must for my three little girls.

Roast Veal with Apricots: Get a shoulder of veal with the bone removed for a nice deep pocket. Then make a regular bread dressing with onions and thyme and sage and pepper and salt. Mix the dressing lightly with enough sirup from a can of apricots to moisten it. Put this in the pocket. Put the veal in the roasting pan with the remainder of the apricot sirup and use this for basting—adding a little water if it becomes necessary. About twenty minutes before your meat is done, put the apricots in the roasting pan. They'll get brown and glaze slightly. Don't let them get too mushy. Then serve up your veal with the apricots around it and an accompanying gravy made from the juice. And lo—the poor veal will disappear like mad. Just gravy with the veal is rather sweet and potatoes just don't seem to "go." (This apricot trick—it could as easily be peaches—works just as well with roast chicken or any other dry meat.)

Helpful Hints for Harried Mothers

Mommy, buy me one of those! Because begging for candy has never seemed to me one of the more delightful aspects of childhood, we have almost eliminated this nagging. The children get a piece of candy after lunch and after supper. The amount is increased for a reward, and withdrawn as a punishment. Milk chocolate is given after lunch—and hard candy is eaten only after supper, when brushing teeth will follow almost immediately.

There's magic in red. Our oldest child was forced to wear glasses, almost overnight, and at the tender age of four. Naturally we worried about whether the other children in nursery school would be cruel about them. One thing I knew. You can't hide the fact that a child wears them. So, instead of some obnoxious, supposedly flesh-colored frames, Morna and I had a great time choosing a bright color. Of course we wound up with red. The first day she wore them I thought of her all morning. She made no comment about them when she got home. Neither did I. In about three days her teacher told me all the children wanted red glasses. I had my answer!

Friends can be frightful. Recently we've been watching the agonies of a four-year-old faced with a new baby sister.

It made us recall that most of the trouble we ever had was usually caused by "solicitous" friends. After we had worked for months in engendering a feeling of possession for the child that was to come, the friends would arrive. Greeted at the door by the little one they'd always fussed over, they'd look directly over her head and say, "Where is that darling new baby?"

We would always say, "Morna will be glad to show you her new baby, I'm sure." It usually stopped them short and made them realize there was another child in the house. And it gave the older child the importance of showing off the baby as her own.

Reward for good behavior. We have a very important chart at our house, consisting almost entirely of gold stars, with a very few black ones interspersed. Each day we give stars for the day's behavior. Too often I found myself correcting the children constantly, without taking the same time to compliment them for acts of kindness. So we instituted this business of putting up the stars in the evening and praising the children for unexpected good behavior. It is really more of a check on my remembering to praise them than it is on their conduct. But they love it. A black star is given only for extraordinary naughtiness. Normally good behavior the next day finds it covered up with gold!

MONDAY DINNER

Tomato Juice
Stuffed Peppers Baked Tomatoes
Green Salad
Husband's Delight Beverage

Stuffed Peppers: I use my leftover veal and apricots as a base for the stuffed peppers. Grind up the veal, use the leftover gravy as a moistening agent and rice or leftover mashed potatoes to eke it out. Cold lamb, which always leaves me cold, I use in stuffed peppers, too, but I make a little brown gravy, grind up a raw carrot with the meat and a small can of mushrooms. (Stems and pieces are cheaper and far more tasty to my notion than the buttons.)

Dessert for this meal is what I call Husband's Delight, and you don't have to start with four eggs and a quart of whipping cream to make it. Store-bought cheese, store-bought crackers and shining red apples or russet pears—that's all. My private poll shows that most men love this combination for dessert—and it is conducive to a "talky" time when the family comes together at the end of the day.

TUESDAY DINNER

Clam Juice
Liver and Bacon
Baked Potatoes Sour-Cream Beets
Cauliflower
Custard with Maple Sirup
Beverage

Liver, some cooks will tell you, should be cooked slowly. Don't you believe it. Sear it on both sides quickly—take it off when meat is pink and the most ardent liver haters will like it.

Sour-Cream Beets: To give color to this rather colorless meal and, more important, to add a little piquancy to a usually bland meal, grate up beets, add sour cream till you like the color—and then heavy with the lemon juice. The result is excellent.

WEDNESDAY DINNER

Clam Juice
Hamburgers Mashed Parsnips
Spinach with Cheese
Canned Peaches and Cookies
Beverage

Wednesday is my usual "meeting" afternoon, when I return late and dinner must be prepared quickly. From washing spinach to setting the table it takes half an hour—with the parsnips cooked in a pressure cooker. We serve them mashed.

Mashed parsnips. Don't groan. We love them—cooked soft, mashed and well seasoned. And here's a vegetable that takes to a snitch of bacon drippings or two tablespoons of maple sirup for flavor.

Spinach with cheese always gets the verdict, "better than ever" from the family. While the spinach still resembles its natural self, take it off the fire, drain it well. Season with salt and pepper and just add a tablespoon or two or three of grated American cheese. Toss it a few times and serve. Even when butter prices drop back into this world, you'll still want to serve it this way.

The clam juice should be served ice cold with a drop of lemon and a teaspoon of tomato juice.

THURSDAY DINNER

Mystery Appetizer
Chicken Margaret
Fluffy Rice String Beans
Apple Brown Betty
Beverage

Short Mystery. We start this meal with what is really a party appetizer. The first time I tasted these at the home of a well-known dress designer I thought, Mmm, delicious—but what in heck is in them? After helping myself liberally I finally guessed. So good—and yet so simple to prepare.

Mystery Appetizer: A can of clams chopped very fine. Mix them with cottage cheese, and for a party, put them in a bowl surrounded with any salt cracker. Then watch your guests go back and back and ——

Chicken Margaret: This is just good old chicken with gravy—but with a difference. We always use a fricassee—not a broiler or a fryer—and not only because it's cheaper: it's just better this way. Have it cut for frying. Wash, dry, season with salt and pepper and dip in flour. Brown it well. Then either in your pressure cooker or a good frying utensil with a deep edge and a tight cover, cook the chicken in two tablespoons of the fat from browning, plus water to cover, plus two or three beef bouillon cubes. When the chicken is tender—and the toughest old rooster really gets tender with this treatment—remove it, thicken your gravy slightly, add a few tablespoons of evaporated milk for a cream gravy, or if you like, add two tablespoons of cooking sherry. Serve up some fluffy rice with this and invite the boss and his wife to dinner and watch your husband get a raise!

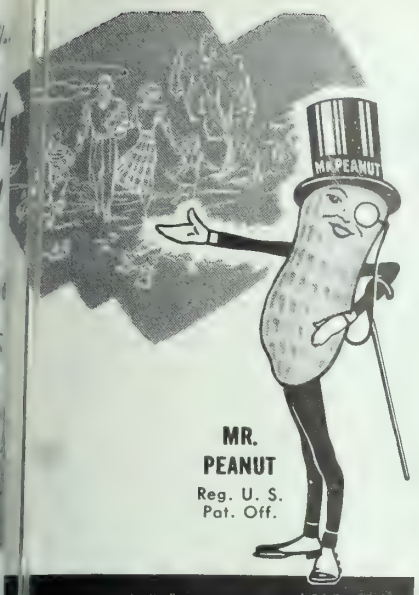
FRIDAY DINNER



Hot Hors d'Oeuvres
Fillet of Sole with Grapes
Peas Boiled New Potatoes
Puréed Apricots
Beverage

For those who never eat fish, even on Friday, I guarantee this dish. There's no odor, no "fishy" taste. To be strictly honest, I should call it "stolen from the Waldorf." It's my own version, in moderately priced terms, of a delicious dish I ate at that hotel.

Hot Hors d'Oeuvres: Almost every delicious hot cheese something takes long minutes to prepare. These can be made in a jiffy in the morning and set in the refrigerator, or ten minutes before you want to serve them, although we think they're better if prepared ahead of time and put into the refrigerator until needed. I use prepared biscuit mix. Roll the dough out to quarter-inch thickness. Spread it with soft cheese worked with enough margarine to make it easily pliable and add a taste of mustard. Then roll the dough, cut into ¾-inch pieces. Put on greased cooky tins. Then pop them into the oven to brown. Good? They're wonderful.

Fillet of Sole with Grapes: Rinse and dry your fillets of flounder (probably not sole) on a paper towel. Grease the bottom of a flat pan. Lay your fillets on this. Add a thin cream sauce, made with evaporated milk, almost to cover. Over the top of the fish and into the sauce at the side, place some seedless grapes cut in half. (It doesn't take a minute to cut them and you need so few a very small bunch will do.) Place under the broiler—not too close—until sauce is bubbling and brown in spots. Serve at once. And do use the grapes. They go with fish like onions with hamburger. (I've made this dish with tuna fish, when I had to prepare supper in a hurry with no preliminary shopping. It is very good, but more expensive than the fresh fillets.)

Dear God, give us strength to accept with serenity the things that cannot be changed. Give us the courage to change the things that can and should be changed. And give us wisdom to distinguish one from the other. —ADMIRAL HART.

Fish Sauce: For other fish my favorite sauce is St. Marks. It's one of those things my mother learned from her mother—but it's certainly not Irish—so maybe she got it out of an early edition of the L.H.J. Serve it with stuffed, baked mackerel; with halibut or cod steaks—well, with any fish. In a saucepan put 2 tablespoons catchup, 2 teaspoons margarine, 1 tablespoon vinegar and 2 teaspoons prepared mustard. Stir well and cook gently for about ten minutes.

SATURDAY LUNCH

Chicken Pie
Baked Apples
Beverage

Saturday's children—and husband—get a simple but hearty luncheon at our house.

I cook the chicken and rice left over from Thursday, and any remnants of vegetables, in a casserole dish with a prepared biscuit crust.

SATURDAY SUPPER

Scrambled Eggs with Virginia Ham
Corn Bread
Cherry Cobbler
Beverage

Saturday supper and both meals on Sunday are shared with the children. Though my oldest are four and six, they are learning the rudiments of cooking by helping prepare supper every Saturday. They adore "stirring," so we always make at least one hot bread, cake, muffins or cookies.

Scrambled Eggs: I usually mix ½ jar Virginia ham spread with 6 eggs and a pinch of mixed herbs. Add 1 tablespoon evaporated milk (it does not make them tough) and then put them over a fire as low as your patience can stand it and stir, stir, stir.

Soup, Beautiful Soup: In the country as main course for supper or lunch, or as the overture to an otherwise light meal if we have unexpected guests, we make the most beautiful soup. It looks as good as it tastes and it's as simple as it is good. Just a can of pea soup and a can of turtle soup. Mix them and heat. In the country, where we get real cream, we whip it up—put a dab on the top of each dish, brown the cream for a second under the broiler and yum-m. But use earthenware casseroles, dearies, not your best china. THE END

KRAFT DINNER SURPRISES are so delicious no one will ever guess "kitchen-time" was minutes instead of hours. All you do is: cut 3 large green peppers in half lengthwise; take out seeds. Boil for 6 minutes in salted water. Drain and place in shallow baking dish. Prepare Kraft Dinner as directed on package. (It takes just 7 minutes to cook that special macaroni, just seconds to sprinkle in fine cheese flavor with Kraft Grated you get in the package). Then serve . . . to a chorus of compliments! For Kraft's macaroni is so tender, the cheese flavor . . . mouth-watering! Keep Kraft Dinner on hand always. It costs only pennies a serving.

FIT YOUR CHILD'S FOOT

By H. L. Whitman

Civilian Consultant on Shoe Fitting and Foot Care for the U. S. Navy

MORE than 3,000,000 babies will be born this year. Almost all of these infants will have perfectly aligned feet, each with its full quota of dimpled toes. Even among those whose foot structure may be faulty, there will not be one single corn, bunion or ingrowing toenail.

Mother Nature certainly does her part. But do we?

Look now at the feet of children six years old. What do you find? More than half of these youngsters have some disorder—a corn, a callus, a joint enlargement. A few even have flat feet.

And at eighteen years old? Eight out of every ten are probably suffering from a foot disturbance.

And why? Because we do not take the trouble to fit our children's feet with shoes that fit properly. We are shocked at the ancient Chinese who maimed their daughters and curtailed their lives by binding their feet in tight bandages. Yet our own nation carelessly cripples its children through a drawn-out series of misfitting shoes.

That's a stinging indictment, and I know it. But I also know whereof I speak. During the war I served as civilian consultant and specialist on shoe fitting and foot care for the United States Navy. I viewed at close range the bare feet of many thousands of young men, from Newport, Rhode Island, to San Diego, California. Eighty per cent were burdened with foot disorders; only approximately one in seven wore shoes that fitted him correctly.

Since the end of the war I have done considerable work with the feet and shoes of school children. Let me tell you a few things I have found out—and then I will tell you what I think you can do about this problem.

ON ONE occasion I supervised an inspection of 200 young school children in Watertown, Massachusetts. Of 50 kindergarten children, I found 45 wearing shoes a half to one size too small. Of 75 first-graders, 69 were shoes too short. Most of these had corns and calluses. In the second grade I found the same sort of thing, only worse: 66 out of 75 children in this grade were shoes too small, and the bad effects included contracted toes, ingrowing toenails, contracted arches and even flat feet.

These children were not poor children. They were in what we call, for lack of a better term, our middle class. By and large they were shining examples of good health. And, ironically, even their poorly fitted shoes were new and shiny and of good make.

"I take good care of my Johnny's feet," one mother told me. "I never pay less than six dollars for his shoes. And he never complains about his feet hurting."

I HAD to count ten before I told her the two basic errors: one, the price of shoes has nothing to do with whether they fit; and two, children rarely, if ever, complain about their shoes hurting. I wish they would.

I can't say just why this is, but what happened at a foot-and-shoe inspection in Lorain, Ohio, of 4000 children will prove my point. Before anything else was done they were asked if their feet hurt; only one replied that they did. Yet three out of four of these sons and daughters of the generous Midwest were wearing shoes one half to three and one half sizes too small.

As for the only child who said her feet hurt, she was a shy, backward little girl named Helen, who had never complained of such a thing before. Her feet measured 6¼ B, but her shoes measured 4¼ D. School officials talked to her parents—who were stunned and contrite—and the proper shoes were bought for her. A remarkable transformation then took place in her personality. She used to stay inside during recess, and as a result had few friends. Now, because her feet no longer hurt, she joined in the other children's play. In turn her school work improved tremendously. She seemed like a new child. It is a pity, however, that her feet could not have been similarly transformed; the four bunions she got will trouble her for life, as well as ruin the shape of every attractive shoe she buys. And if ever she takes a job requiring long periods of standing, how her feet will ache!

"My feet are killing me!"—the great American lament. Yet this wail could be reduced to a whisper by a far-reaching program of foot education, foot sense and foot examinations. I'd like to see school health authorities give the same attention to children's feet that they now give to eyes, ears and noses. I'd like to see executives of the shoe industry hit home to the public with information on proper shoe fitting. The day will come—but meanwhile the mothers will have to do the job themselves, beginning with the first pair of shoes they buy their babies, and continuing until the children, too, have learned what proper shoe fit is, and what it means in terms of health and happiness.

Any or all of the following disorders may begin from the wearing in childhood of shoes that are not properly fitted:

1. Distortions: corns, calluses, bunions, hammertoes, ingrown toenails, heel spurs, fallen arches.

Child in Church

By Frances Stowell Guthrie

Among the kneeling forms this one,
Erect and curious-eyed,
Watches the fingers of the sun
Through oval casements slide
Like jeweled dust. The words of prayer
The older worshipers
Must learn are natural to him,
And so his body stirs
In quick rebellion to the hush.
A catbird calls somewhere;
A cricket drums a tinny drum
Across the autumn air.

His mother stills the child—her blush
Apologetic, shy.
And those about can hear the boy
Whisper a puzzled "Why?"
And why indeed? It does not seem
A strange thing that this one
Among the kneeling forms should yearn
Outward to the sun.

SAGGING ruins your looks harms your health

Before she got her Spencer Supports.

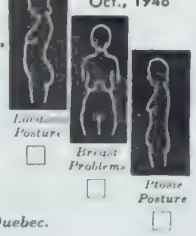
In her Spencer Body and Breast Supports designed especially for her.

SAGGING BREASTS—a sign of weakened tissues. This impairs circulation and renders breasts less resistant to unhealthful conditions. And sagging breasts make you look older—ruin the lines of your clothes.

SAGGING ABDOMEN—a sign that the muscles have weakened. If neglected, this can lead to serious displacement of abdominal organs. Sagging abdomen also places unnatural strain on the back which, unless checked, may cause serious harm.

There's beauty and health in SPENCER SUPPORT!

It's just common sense to have a Spencer designed for you to give you health-giving support and posture. It will free you of bulges—give nature a chance to strengthen weakened ligaments and muscles. You'll be protected against the tired back and nervous fatigue caused by faulty posture—and you'll have the lovely lines you've longed for.



Your Spencer Body and Breast Supports will be individually designed, cut and made to meet your needs and yours alone. Every Spencer is guaranteed never to lose its shape. A support that loses its shape loses its effectiveness.

bowlegs, knock-knees, athlete's foot and varicose veins.

2. Leg, hip and back pains: tight shoes create a constriction which is carried upward by the nerve system.

3. Poor posture: harmful shoes encourage poor walking habits, throwing off the natural alignment of the feet and leg muscles and drawing down the whole body posture.

4. Chronic mental and physical fatigue: when an unnatural pressure binds any part of the body, the drain on nervous energy and physical stamina is felt throughout and general efficiency decreased proportionately.

There are twenty-six bones in the human foot, any or all of which may be deprived of their natural functions by ill-fitting shoes. It must be remembered that a child's foot is not an adult foot in miniature; rather it is a growing structure which only gradually reaches the proportions of an adult foot. Shoes must be fitted during childhood to allow for this continuing growth.

And now, here are ten points to remember when you fit your child's foot for shoes that will be healthful and helpful:

1. Measure your child's foot once a month. The foot of the average child between one and a half and seven years of age grows one half size (about one sixth of an inch) every three months. Some children's feet grow in spurts; some gradually; some more; some less. A monthly check—which any good shoe store should be happy to help you with—will insure continuing proper fit.

2. Do not depend entirely on measuring devices for determining foot size. When using an X-ray machine, take into account the fact that it shows only the bony structure and not the fatty tissue. When using a rule device, see that measurements are taken while your child is standing with his full weight on the measured foot.

3. Fit all shoes with the child standing. Standing and walking cause the foot to lengthen and expand in degrees that vary with each individual.

4. See that there is always three quarters of an inch space between the end of the large toe and the tip of the shoe. Toes need space for gripping; they are not mere decorations, like the fringe on a rug.

5. See that the widest part of the foot fits exactly into the widest part of the shoe—not slightly ahead nor slightly behind.

6. See that the shank of the shoe—which contains the arch of the foot—is supple and spacious enough to allow freedom and action.

7. See that the heel fits snugly but allows a slight up-and-down movement. It's the tight heel which causes blisters.

8. See that the child's foot does not bulge over the outer edges of the shoe.

9. Be sure of a comfortable and smooth fit over the instep. Each width size means a quarter of an inch difference in circumference of the inside. One size too narrow means the difference between comfort and pressure.

10. Use common sense in picking shoe styles. Although sizes may be the same for two children, one may need a heavy oxford, another a short vamp.

And whatever you do, never sacrifice fit to fashion; fit your child's foot—not your eye.

the same rather sirupy tan. The floor was stained with a dark reddish-brown oil stain.

Miss Minerva had a bathroom all her own, which was more than some of the younger teachers had. In it there were a tub on claw-end legs, a bowl, a toilet with a brown cracked seat cover, and a small painted cupboard. There was also a dingy radiator which hissed all winter, and on this Miss Minerva kept a flat board to hold supplies.

The water faucet in the tub had been dripping for five years, and someday the college would get around to fixing it. Meanwhile it went on dripping, but she got used to it after a year or two. Even if she had been th executive homemaker type, she couldn't have done anything about it, for outside plumbers were not allowed by the college manager, Mr. Black. Nobody could have anything repaired without his sanction.

Miss Minerva ate all her meals in the dining room of Main Hall, presiding at a table for eight. She said grace before dinner every night. The other faculty members often ate at the Brass Kettle or downtown, or even went away week ends, but she never did. The only change in food she ever experienced during the school year was when the dietitian was changed.

She gave her lessons in the basement of Main Hall, where a corridor had been fitted with tiny practice rooms. The piano was almost as old as she was. Through the window came all the steam from the college laundry, with the smell of bleach and soap.

THE music department of Buckley was like many music departments in small coeducational colleges or women's colleges. Buckley was a school for "liberal arts," but there was nothing liberal about the curriculum and absolutely no emphasis on arts. This was before the war had been stirred like yeast into the life of the school.

Music and painting were looked upon by the rest of the faculty as light studies. Only mathematics and Latin and Greek and physics and biology really disciplined the mind, they said; they were basic subjects. Psychology and economics were all right for padding. Spanish was too easy to do anybody any real good. French was on a slightly higher level, but not much.

Miss Minerva gave her lessons and put on her student recitals, therefore, without anybody's bothering. And this might have gone on forever, except that the college acquired a new president, and he was a new broom.

The first year he "retired" several secretaries who were too old to take dictation. The second year, the history and German departments had a retread. This year, the third, he was turning his attention to music and art.

"Minnie will get the ax," said Cora Lee.

"It's about time. But she's so tight, she must have a mint of money," said Jinx, her roommate.

Cora Lee pulled on a lemon-yellow sweater and stepped into her moccasins. "Well, I got to ankle over and learn how to sing like Hilda Larsen," she said. "The recital is day after tomorrow. You coming?"

"I hear your voice too much," said Jinx. "And honestly, those recitals! Do they stink!"

"All I can say is my voice hasn't gone backwards."

"I think you're positively psychotic to keep on with Minnie all this time," Jinx told her.

"I want the A. It's the easiest way I know to get it." Cora Lee made herself a deep red mouth. "And don't forget Minnie's going to get me an audition with Hilda Larsen if and when I get to New York. She practically promised."

"Somehow I can't quite feature Minnie the Mouse and Hilda Larsen," yawned Jinx.

Cora Lee went out. The campus was bright with color, sweaters in every shade, socks to match. It was exciting and new to wear short skirts and socks and flat moccasins. Last year stockings were required, but somehow the rule had eased up. The laxness that was to end in jeans and boys' shirts with the tails out was already beginning.

The wistaria hung a purple veil over the porch of Main, and Cora Lee stopped under it a moment and looked up. It was like being roofed in violet. She hummed a bit of St. Louis Blues. Cora Lee had the best voice in Buckley, and the best that Miss Minerva had ever had during all the years. It was resonant, naturally sweet, and climbed easily up to the highest notes. She could sing the Bell Song from Lakmé and keep the notes smooth as honey. The songs Miss Minerva helped her with she did less well, being hampered by the rather odd ideas Minerva had, but the songs she sang without benefit of instruction she sang like an angel.

She was majoring in history.

Cora Lee was a hard, practical-minded girl. She had no patience with softness. She believed in buttering your own bread, and buttering it well. It was not an age of sentiment. She would have said there was not a vulnerable spot in her whole being. She was in love, because that was the thing, but she didn't lie awake at night brooding about it. Maury said she was colder than Little America. And looked like a perfect rose.

As she turned into the practice corridor, she met the violin teacher and nodded briefly to him. His job was safe, even if he couldn't play on key, because his wife was related to the president of the board of trustees. But Miss Minnie, she thought, was a dead duck right now.

"Now, we'll just run over your songs for the recital," said Minerva. "I'm not quite satisfied with the last phrase in the Fairy Pipers."

"Why can't I sing a new song?" asked Cora Lee perversely.

Miss Minerva looked shocked. "In building a program," she said in her dry, tight voice, "one has to take certain things into consideration."

"Such as what?"

"Balance," said Miss Minerva vaguely, "and . . . proportion."

Cora Lee opened her lips to say something nasty about never learning anything new, and then shut them again. Miss Minerva looked bad, she noticed. She always looked like a horse, but today her face was gray. She wore a brown dress shaped like a sack, and a pair of old brown shoes. The hem of the dress had partly come down. The shoes were muddy. And the hair net on her rusty hair had a large hole in it, from which a clump of hair stuck out.

She needs a good currying, thought Cora Lee with disgust.

Miss Minerva spread her large bony hands over the yellowed keys and nodded her head briskly. "Remember the phrasing," she said, and banged at the first chord.

Cora Lee sang. Outside, the laundry boy put down the basket of snowy sheets and leaned against the ivied wall, listening. Three girls on their way to gym stopped too. Cora Lee was pleased, but not excited. She knew she could sing, but she was lazy, and she knew that to be a singer required an awful lot of hard work, even if the faculty at Buckley thought it was a cinch. A career didn't interest her, so she made little effort really to arouse an audience.

Maybe, she thought, looking at Miss Minerva, maybe if she'd an inspiring teacher these four years, she might have gone on—made something of her voice. But she hadn't learned a single thing; she had been bored to death, she was fed up. This was her last recital, and if she knew the signs, Miss Minerva's last one too. The fairy pipers would quit playing. She laughed at the thought.

Miss Minerva made clucking noises and pushed the pedal sharply. "I think you better sing it again," she said, "and then we'll run over your last number."

When Cora Lee finally left, Miss Minerva sat at the piano, her elbow on the music rack, her head supported by her hand. It was time to wash up and get to the dining room before the herd of students stampeded in. This was fish day. Bless this food to our use, and us to Thy faithful service. But she wasn't hungry, she didn't want to eat. A deep thick fear had settled in her bosom under the cotton brassière.

Hilda Larsen was coming to sing at the Opera House. It was the kind of thing that could never happen. As fantastic as the way one could never get on the streetcar to go downtown without finding one's worst enemy on that same streetcar. It was the way deserters always met their chief officer in some bar in a foreign port.

And yet it was going to happen. For the chain of circumstances wasn't really strange. Hilda Larsen's manager was the same one who had arranged for the concert which a great baritone was to give in the Opera House, and a sudden indisposition on the part of the latter made a shift necessary. Hilda Larsen just happened to be on the way to Miami and could stop over one night without upsetting anything. She didn't care, she was always trying to get off trains and stop over. Trains bored her.

The notice appeared in the Daily Crescent. Hilda Larsen, world-famous diva, the notice said wildly, would appear in place of the great star. Having dazzled the crowned heads of Europe, what more fitting than that she should come to Buckley and dazzle the subscribers for the concert series so capably managed by Fitzlee Andrews?

"I'm kinda looking forward to school starting so we can play hooky and stuff."

Miss Minerva was shivering as she sat at the piano, though the spring air coming in was warm even in the basement. The whole world was in an ecstasy of blossoming and sweet smell and exciting color. But Miss Minerva crept blindly up the stairs without noticing. Her bad knee creaked as she climbed the curlicues to her room and closed the door and sank down on the sagging bed.

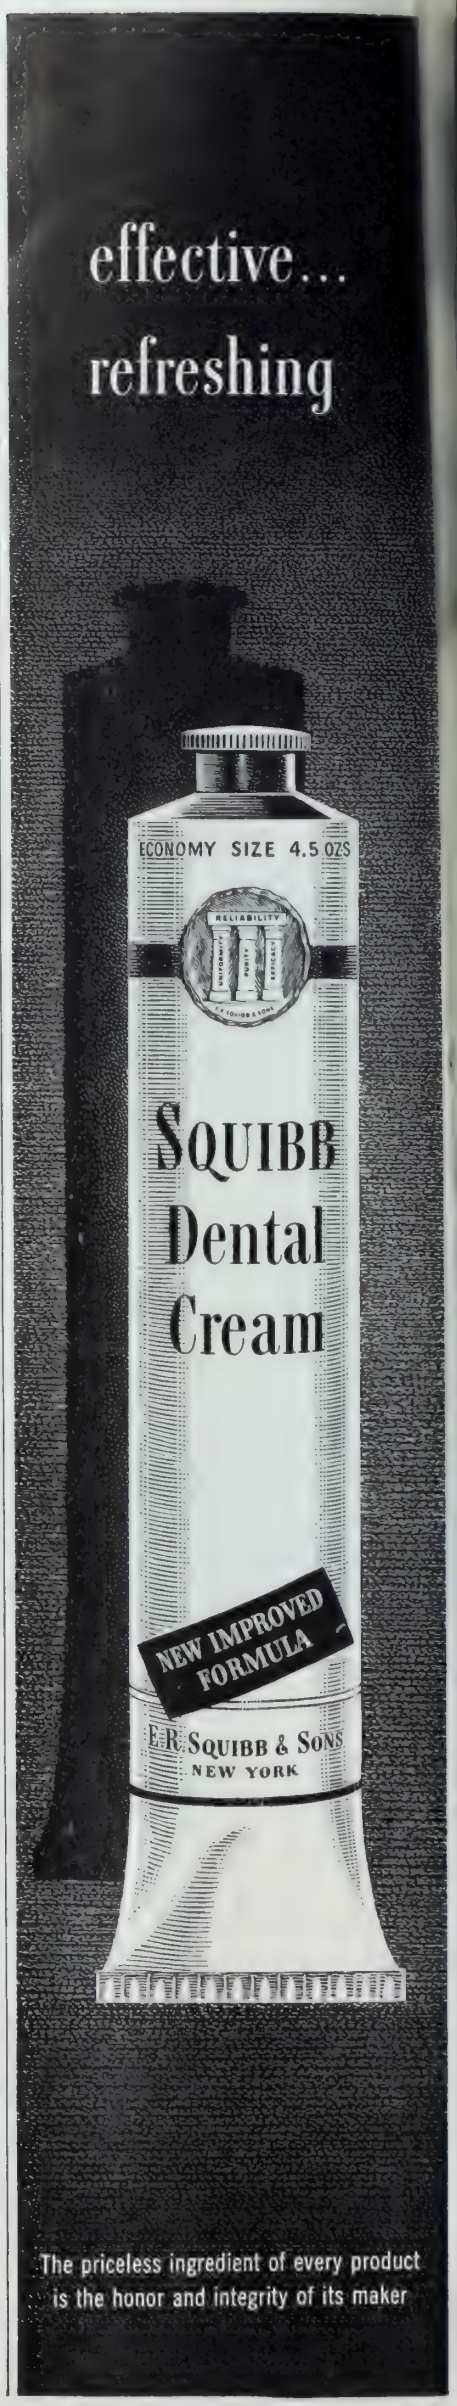
When she looked up, she saw the cold, confident eyes of the young girl in the picture looking right at her, and uttering a small broken cry, she buried her face in her hands and wept.

The afternoon of the recital was hot, with the penetrating unseasonal heat of some spring days. The campus lawns were brilliant green, and the wistaria already was blown so amethyst petals strewed the steps. But it was cool in the chapel when Miss Minerva came in, blinking at the dimness after dazzle.

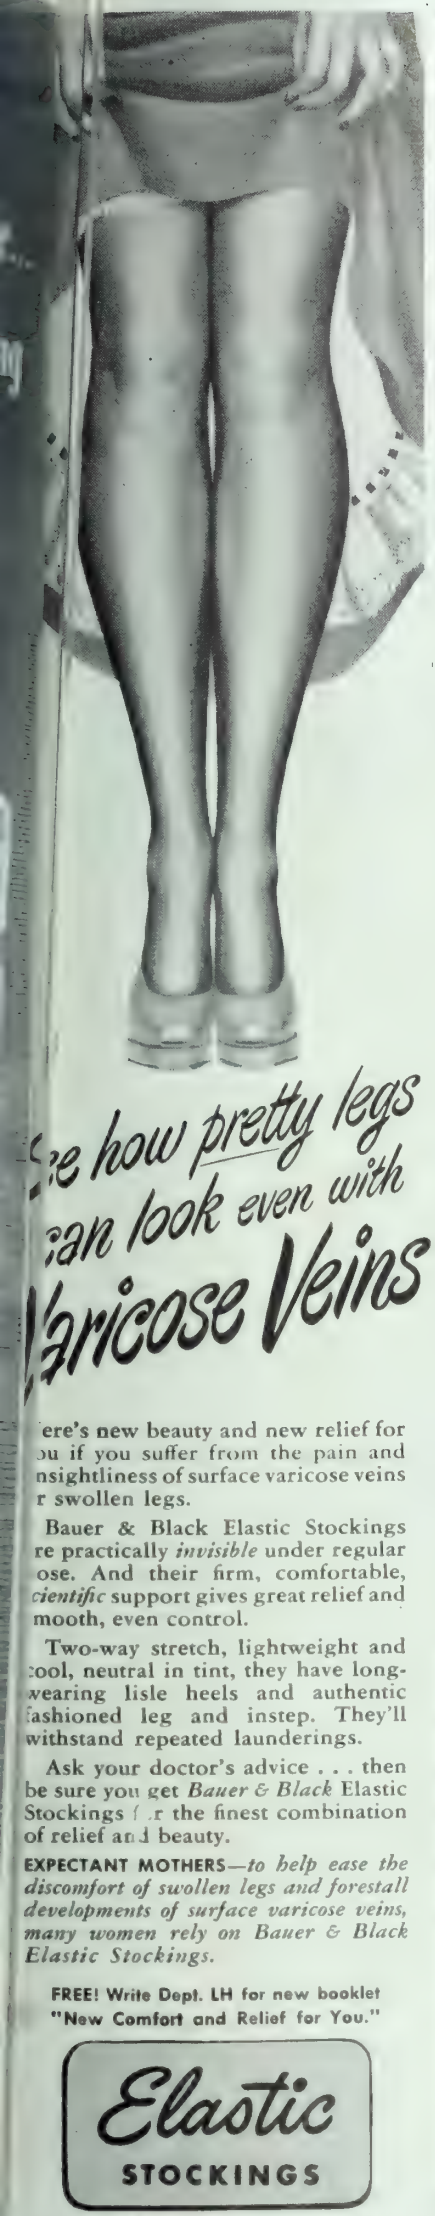
They had mimeographed programs, always too many. Nobody ever came to the recitals except the people who were performing or some relative unlucky enough to be visiting at the time. Or a few music students from other teachers. Today there were more than usual because there was a Y. W. meeting right afterward and the Y. W. people drifted in. And just at the beginning, the heavy metal doors swung open to admit the president and a couple of board members who sat down inconspicuously in the rear.

Cora Lee was standing at the edge of the gray cyclorama, looking out. She wore a plain gray dress and her hair was gold as it fell softly down her neck. She looked scornfully at the audience; it was nothing to her. She was finished with singing anyway. Too much bother. None of this attic stuff for her, she thought contemptuously; she wanted a white satin cover on her bed. She looked over at Miss Minerva, and wondered what was wrong with her. Her eyes were red and the lids puffy. She was a sight. Worse than usual, which was bad enough.

Miss Minerva always wore a beaded crepe dress in a queer metallic-blue shade. And pointed kid pumps. The dress, she always said, had come from Paris. Well, about the time Paris was founded, Cora Lee said to herself. Years when dresses were short, Minerva trotted over to the little dressmaker and had the hem taken up; other years she had it let down. The former hemlines were visible when long skirts were in. And now the dress had an unfortunate way of shedding beads, so Minerva walked with the faint, tinkly sound of falling glass.



Miss Minerva accompanied her students, striking the keynote separately before each chord, and if there seemed to be any doubt about it, striking it several times. And every time the student hit a high note, Minerva turned her face sharply and faced the audience as if to say, "You see, she really got there!" Even the way she turned her head looked horselike, and her pawing at the pedals emphasized the effect. She came down on the pedals at random, but with vigor.



Cora Lee, waiting her turn, saw the president shifting restlessly in his seat. He whispered something to the man beside him, who nodded. Cora Lee had no doubt about their reason for being at the recital. And it would be a good thing to fire Miss Minnie, the poor old horse.

A weak spattering of hands marked the end of I Hear a Thrush at Eve, sung doubtfully by Mary Jane Winter.

Cora Lee went out and stood waiting for her chord. Now she could see how dreadfully pale Miss Minerva looked; her whole face had a greenish look, except that under her eyes were smears of purple.

Miss Minerva gave her a ghastly imitation of a smile and brought her hands down on the keys. Her hands were trembling.

She knows, thought Cora Lee. She looked at her teacher's anxious eyes and suddenly, for no reason at all, felt a twinge of sympathy. This was too much like cornering a rabbit and closing in for the kill. Minnie might not know anything, but she worked all the time there was. She never did anything else but work. Never went anywhere, never had any fun, never saw anybody but the students. Cora Lee thought, Oh, to blazes with it, I'll show 'em she's got a good one.

And she really put her mind, for once, on her singing. After her first number there was a stir of attention. The second, which of course was Ave Maria, made even more of an impression. The clapping was genuine and enthusiastic. And a faint color came into Miss Minerva's gray cheeks.

Cora Lee did the Fairy Pipers, a song she detested thoroughly. She could just imagine chasing around after fairy pipers, and the thing was so old it was falling apart at the seams. But today she sang it as if she enjoyed it.

"When all the birds have gone to sleep
And all the frogs are still ——"

She had them all intent, and it felt good and it was easy. She let the notes come out pure and round.

"Airy fairy pipers underneath the silver moon ——"

And when the program was over, Miss Minerva was taking her hand, quite speechless. Cora Lee got away as fast as she could. She didn't like the strange sensation of pity which had been with her on the stage. What in time was the matter with her, getting all soft and silly? She'd cut the next lesson. Her mark was safe after today.

When bad men combine, the good must associate; else they will fall, one by one, an unpitied sacrifice in a contemptible struggle.

—EDMUND BURKE.

As she went to the mailbox to see if she had the daily letter from Maury, she saw the poster on the bulletin board.

"Oh, Cora Lee, this means you!" called her roommate, and she stopped to see what she meant.

A special block of seats for the Hilda Larsen concert was being reserved for the college. And the morning before, Hilda Larsen was going to give auditions to the three best students in the music department.

"So that's Jones and Bender and you," said Jinx. "And look, if you get a scholarship at Juilliard how about me coming up to live with you?"

"Nonsense," said Cora Lee. "I'm not bothering."

"Don't you even want to meet Hilda Larsen?"

"What for?"

"Well, think of seeing the ideal after hearing about her all this time from Minnie. Say—do you suppose she'll come out and eat at our table? We'll have a lion in our dining room!"

The babble increased. Everybody began to speculate now about Hilda and Miss Minerva. Curious and eager as kittens, they wondered whether they could go down to the train in a gang and watch the meeting. Was Minnie going to wear that old brown suit? And the shoes? And the hat with the dead finch on it?

Inside of half an hour the whole corridor was echoing with excited voices. A real celebrity! And their own obscure voice teacher! Why, it was really romantic! Probably Hilda Larsen would be there for Sunday dinner, in which case certainly they would have turkey and cranberry sauce and ice cream, even if it were not Thanksgiving. They had turkey for John Mason Brown, and he couldn't sing; he just talked.

Cora Lee had lab that next afternoon. On her way down the long corridor, she passed the president's office and looked in to nod and speak. He made a point of keeping his door open so the students would feel that he was really part of the group. The result was that many of them scurried past because they couldn't think of anything to murmur as he looked up from his desk.

Today as Cora Lee glanced in, she saw that he had a visitor in the chair by the desk. Miss Minerva Martin was sitting there; there was no mistaking her narrow stiff back, and she had the black-and-white print on too. As Cora Lee looked, the president's secretary stepped quietly across the room and closed the door.

Well, thought Cora Lee, he's giving her the gate early. Good riddance for Buckley. She shook her head scornfully and went on up to the lab. There was no reason for her to give it another thought, and yet she did. Possibly it was because twice a week for four years she had spent half an hour with Miss Minerva. Maybe even if you despised a person, that much time with her made some kind of link.

Cora Lee couldn't explain it, but she felt restless all during lab, even more restless than usual. Miss Minnie must have plenty of money after all these years of spending absolutely nothing. And even if she got the sack, she would have all the glory of Hilda Larsen's appearance. Think of how jealous the rest of the music department would be! Not one of them knew a single celebrity. Why, it was a triumph. After all the years of her talking and bragging about Hilda Larsen, now she had a chance to bring her right out on campus. Imagine the great Larsen sitting up in the awful room facing the picture of herself as a young girl. Imagine her at the table while Miss Minnie bent her long face and said, "Bless this food to our use, and us to Thy faithful service!"

Cora Lee, as soon as lab was over, started to her room along the bridgeway. Well, maybe she better let Minnie know she was not coming to lesson tomorrow. Kind of mean to let her sit and wait there all period in that old cellar room.

I ought to have my head examined, thought Cora Lee. What do I care for? I'll tell her I'm quitting. For good. Just a rat leaving the sinking ship.

SHE climbed the curlicues, went down the dark hall and tapped at Miss Minerva's door. There was a little silence and then a murmur and Cora Lee went in.

Miss Minerva was sitting at the desk, with a little pile of underwear and towels beside her.

She gave Cora Lee a vague look and said in a low voice, "I am making out my laundry list."

"I don't mean to bother you," said Cora Lee, feeling uneasy.

"Not at all, not at all," murmured Minerva. "I just thought it was best to list the laundry. One doesn't like to make trouble for people. Does one?"

"No, no, I guess not."

Cora Lee gave her message, but she only said she couldn't come the next day. Someway she didn't feel so ruthless. There was something about Miss Minnie ——

"I won't be here either," said Miss Minerva.

Cora Lee went along the hall again had something niggling around the b her mind. Minnie looked . . . queer. doesn't like to make trouble"; what d mean by that? Nobody else would l laundry for her, in any case. Either sh it to the college plant or she didn't. W would she be saving trouble for? Wher she going?

CORA LEE got to her room, and slipp her sweater and began to brush her sh fall of hair. Her face stared back at he she wasn't thinking about how beautif was. She was puzzling about that lau list.

Was Minnie touched in the head that talk with the president? The reason there would be for anybody to make out her laundry list would that she was in the infirmary.

"Miss Martin, said Cora Lee, "ma I come in?" and sh opened the door an moved inside th room quickly.

Miss Minerva gav a start and looke blankly at Cora Lee. Then a deep dark flus spread slowly over the paleness of her face She stammered, "I—have a headache— pill ——"

But Cora Lee went to her and firmly took the bottle.

"I wouldn't take a pill right now," she said. "You come down to the drug with me for some hot tea!"

And then, hearing the kindness in her voice, they were both astounded. And either the strangeness of it, or the fact that Miss Minerva was really at the end of her rope, made her suddenly collapse on the bed and cover her face with her hands in the age-old gesture of a woman stricken.

"Oh dear, oh dear, oh dear," she said monotonously.

"Miss Minerva, you mustn't feel bad," Cora Lee said. "It isn't really so bad as all that."

"Bad?" asked Minerva. "Yes, it couldn't be any worse."

There was a finality about the words. After she had said them, she pushed her straggling hair back and lifted her head and sat very quietly, staring at Cora Lee and yet not focusing her eyes on her.

Cora Lee didn't know what to do. Her natural instinct was always to avoid unpleasant scenes by going away from them as

Country Girl

By Eleanor Alletta Chaffee

The neighbors said
That she was daft,
But when she heard them
She only laughed.
Her mouth was crimson,
Her long eyes green,
Her house the untidiest
Ever seen.
She invited her love
For tea one day;
He looked at the dust,
Then looked away.
But he came back
Through the broken gate
For cookies served
From a chipped blue plate.

The neighbors crossed
Themselves in fright
When they heard her whistling
One moonlit night.
And what a man
Of his steady ways
Saw in her
And her witch's gaze
They said was queer
As her feckless laughter.
But they lived like lovers Forever after!

fast as possible. But now she had a compelling sense that she must not, simply must not leave Miss Minerva, not until she felt better. She cast about in her mind for the right words of comfort.

"Hilda Larsen will be here tonight," she said. "And you'll want to see her and have a nice long visit ——"

"Hilda Larsen," said Miss Minerva, "has never seen me in her life!"

The effect of this staggering piece of news was to confuse Cora Lee completely. "Why, you can't say that!" she said. "There's her picture right there on your wall!"

"I bought it," said Miss Minerva, "from the photo shop in Snowshoe, Minnesota, when I was at home years and years ago."

"Bought it?"

"Yes," Miss Minerva told her. "For a dollar and forty cents."

Cora Lee sat down on the desk chair. But if Minerva had bought that picture, then Hilda Larsen had never given it to her—and then if she hadn't . . . well, then, she did not owe her career to having taken lessons of Minerva. And all that story of Minerva's was a plain lie.

"I made it all up," said Miss Minerva, confirming her discovery.

"But—but whatever for?" Cora Lee asked.

"I didn't have anything," explained Minerva, pinching up little pieces of her dress. "I just didn't."

"But what good did it do to pretend about her?"

"It gave me something to be proud of," said Miss Minerva. "Everybody has to have one thing in the world to be proud of. So I had Hilda Larsen."

In the silence that fell, the sound of the voices on the campus came like the twitter of gathering swallows at twilight. The late sun laid a level wash of gold against the dusty pane and the air was unbearably sweet as it stirred the brown lace curtains. It was just too beautiful a world, too full of riches.

"I DIDN'T mind not coming back to teach any more," said Minerva. "I knew that would come. But having it come right this week, right when she is coming—you can see how it is, Cora Lee."

"Yes, I see."

"But you run along now, it's near time for dinner," said Minerva. "I'll just tidy up a bit and come down in time to say the blessing. I don't want to make any trouble for anybody."

Heavens on earth, thought Cora, does she mean she won't take too many of those pills? Or that she will wait until she's presided at the table so the dining room won't be upset now that it's so near dinnertime? Why can't a person ever understand what's going on inside someone?

And this was the first time in her life Cora Lee had ever wanted to understand what was going on inside anybody except herself.

"What would you do if you didn't come back?" she asked.

"I have a little house out at the edge of Snowshoe," said Miss Minerva. "My sister has always lived there; that is, until she died."

"I didn't know you had a sister," Cora Lee said.

"She's always been delicate"—Minerva spoke slowly—"and as long as I had to take care of her, I really don't know what would have happened if I had lost my position. I really don't."

"You mean you have been supporting her all the time?"

"She was delicate, she had to rest a deal," Miss Minerva explained. "B died last summer."

"Oh, dear," said Cora Lee.

"One can manage on very little," Minerva; "really very little. It takes for two. Much more."

Out of the chaos in her mind, Cor found an idea. "I will run along," she just as if they had been having tea. " really came to tell you I want to sir Hilda Larsen in the morning and I wan to promise you will go over the music me before I go. Will you?"

Miss Minerva stopped pinching the "Why, yes, Cora Lee," she said, "I w would really be a bad woman if I di wouldn't I? And as they always say, play's the thing, my dear, the play's thing."

CORA LEE hurried along the shadowy w and got the college taxi. "I want to the five-forty-five," she said "and you'll have to step on it."

"I can't make it," he said. "It's twenty now."

"Make it anyhow," said Cora Lee.

She braced her moccasins against the and clung to the seat as they swayed jolted along the back streets. And she going over the wh thing again.

Miss Miner hadn't been a mi she didn't have money. She h scrimped a pinched and li like nothing on ea and—and never or peeped about Every other facul member who h cousins to he through school sick mothers or an thing just went town about it. B Miss Minerva sa nothing. She'd wo those awful cloth without a murmu never wangled an i vitation to a dinne never toadied to any body. They ha laughed at her, taken her off in skits year afte year, the young and fortunate. And now sh was pushed out on the plank to sink or swim and nobody would even notice it. They'd neve give a banquet to her, and a gold watch.

What made it all worse was that yo couldn't figure what she had to make lif worth living. Because the gifted, the excit ing, the successful teachers always had that relationship with the students. Like Cora Lee had with Doctor Palmer, the Shakespeare man. Lots of the teachers had their pets, their little circle, and maybe they got warmth enough out of that. But Cora Lee, the best Minerva ever had or could hope to have, had barely been civil to her. Arrogant, hard, rude, scornful. All these words came to Cora Lee now. Lazy too.

They heard the whistle of the train as it slowed for the junction. "Might yet make it," said the driver, getting interested himself in the race.

So Minerva's life had been built around the myth of Hilda Larsen. And now that was over too. What a scandal it would make. The campus would boil with it like a teakettle over the hottest fire. Cora Lee knew herself and her fellow students very well. They would giggle, and make remarks, and point out, and ask demure questions to turn the knife. The laughingstock of the college. Defenseless.

It was horrible to think of, it was a humiliation nobody could endure. The faculty members would not be above joining in. People don't like to feel tricked, thought Cora Lee. No, if it got out in the morning that Hilda Larsen said she never had heard of Miss Minerva Martin, every last thing would fall down on the poor old thing.

"Here she comes," said the driver.

THROUGH YOUR COMMUNITY CHEST

"I'll pay you tomorrow," said Cora Lee. Meet me in front of Main at nine-thirty. I ant to go downtown anyhow. 'By now."

She slammed the door and ran down the tform as the train stopped and the porters ung down the steep steps. Her hair was ing, and her sweater was smudged from e lab. For once, she had no time to make rself a mouth.

She ran down to the Pullmans and got to e last car just as Hilda Larsen stepped out, egant in gray and blue, and followed re- ectfully by her accompanist and three gskin bags.

"Miss Larsen," said Cora Lee, "I do not ant an autograph."

Hilda Larsen's ice-blue eyes looked sur- rised.

"I want to ride to the hotel and have an nterview," said Cora Lee, "before you see nybody else."

Miss Larsen was bored. She looked at Cora Lee. She was also a hard woman, and naybe she recognized some quality in Cora Lee's face that reminded her of herself at hat age—heaven knew how long ago.

"Okay, baby," she said. "I'll hear your story." She turned on the sweating accom- panist. "Don't scratch those bags, Ivan."

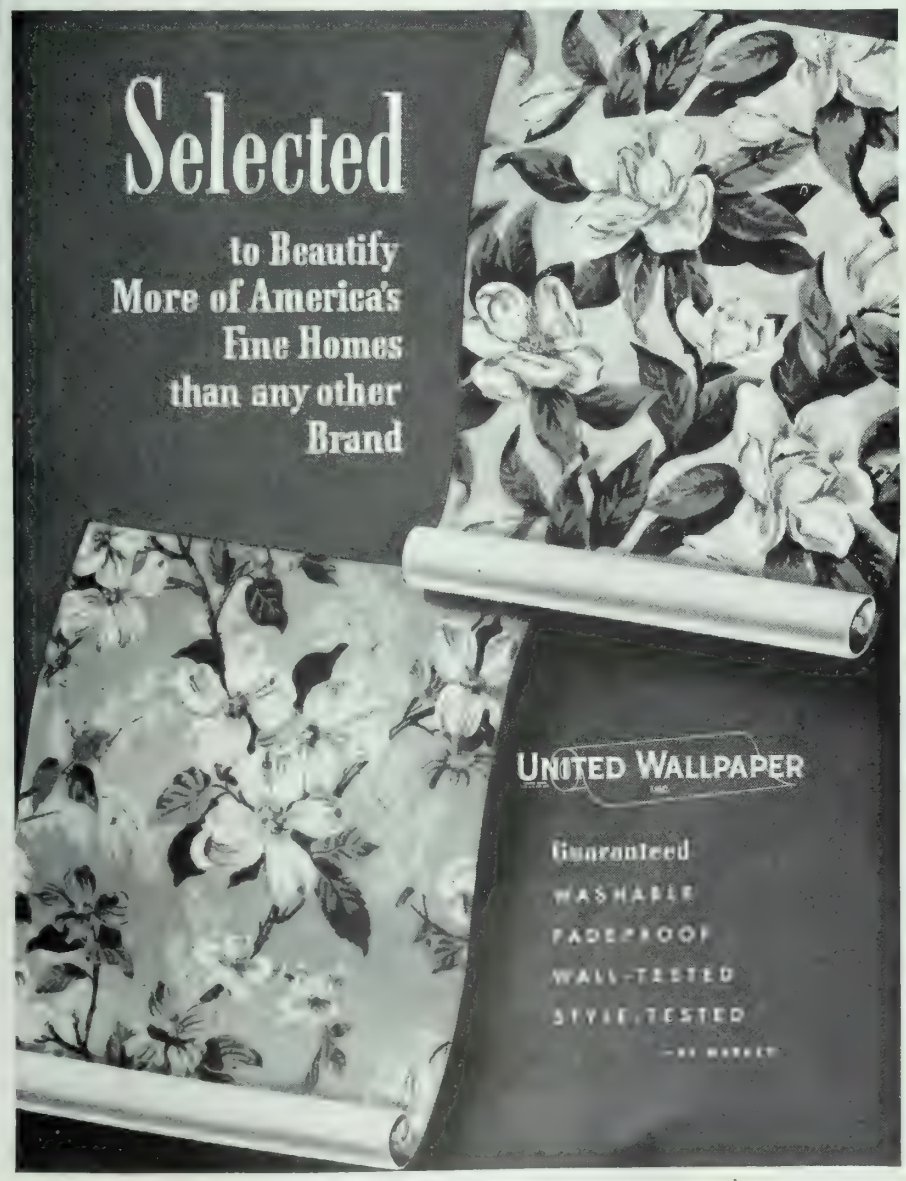
If Cora Lee had been timid, or soft, or adoring, or almost anything she should have been, the story would have ended before they got to the Carroll Hotel. But Cora Lee was not afraid of anything, and she was hard and sure and she ignored the fact that Hilda Larsen was a great singer, a fabulously suc- cessful woman, a second or third Jenny Lind. She just sat there and told the truth, while the heady scent of Hilda's million-dollar per- fume filled the musty old taxi. She talked about Snowshoe, and Hilda remembered her dreary, mean youth. And she talked about this woman who made her whole life out of a dream of just knowing Hilda.

And all Hilda said when they reached the hotel was, "Bring her with you tomorrow. I'll hear you sing. I suppose you sing like a crow."

"You'll be surprised," said Cora Lee.

The whole college blazed with excitement. Everything else was forgotten. The girls in Main wore a special smug look. For it was in their dining room that Hilda Larsen sat, right at Minerva's table, looking just out of this world and laughing and talking. Her diamonds caught the light and flashed. Her perfume was sniffed by a hundred eager young noses. Miss Minerva looked dazed. Cora Lee sat on the other side of Miss Larsen, eating her broccoli silently, but smiling a funny little smile.

The president sat between Hilda Larsen and Miss Minerva. He was planning a fare- well banquet and had made discreet inquiries as to whether Miss Minerva had a gold watch or not. After all, Buckley should recognize an old, faithful teacher who was responsible for the beginning of a singer like Hilda Larsen. It gave tone to the place.



And after they had eaten, they all came out into the exquisite spring evening and Hilda Larsen turned to Cora Lee. "You can sing," she said. "What are you going to do about it? Do you want my recommenda- tion?"

Miss Minerva had a dreamy, ecstatic look. None of this she would ever understand. How could Hilda Larsen remember her, re- member hearing her sing in the Methodist church, decide to look up her old friend, feel she had done a wonderful job with young singers like Cora Lee?

It shows how wrong one is to despair, she thought humbly, for one never knows. Around the corner it may be different. And she trotted happily along beside Hilda, happier than any angel in heaven. And I am responsible for Cora Lee going on with her career, she thought, and that was the ultimate fulfillment any teacher could desire.

And strangely enough, Miss Minerva was right. For certainly the fact that Cora Lee went on to become a fourth Jenny Lind was due to her, though not in the way she thought.

This is the time to go out to the woods after butternuts and hickory nuts and hazelnuts. The trees spread their flaming glory against a sky like the breast of a bluebird.

Diary of Domesticity

By Gladys Taber

NOW the freezer is really full, and the shelves are compact with ranked jars, and the squash and pumpkins and cabbages are stored. Apples send a faint winy odor through the cellar. There are also the baskets of carrots packed in damp sand, and the last cucumbers are down in the dill and brine.

But the garden still feeds us. The sturdy chard and the late beets are fine; Jill brings in a few tomatoes that were protected from the black frost by tangles of vines. Extra dividends in acorn squash make good suppers stuffed with baby sausage. There may be a little broccoli too.

And this is the time to go out to the woods after butternuts and hickory nuts and hazelnuts. The trees spread their flaming glory against a sky like the breast of a bluebird. The upper pastures are gray-green, and the old quiet ledges are warm with golden light. Every year it is as if I had never seen it before and could not see it enough. And yet I have the memory of other years, too; special days when I walked up toward the crest of the hill with special people. The butternuts are dark and sticky, the hickory nuts satiny under the green plastic case. The hazelnuts are fringed with cinnamon, and their cases most exquisitely formed.

George's cows stand in pleasant aimlessness on the lower slopes, and Shep and Maeve are after a woodchuck. Maeve flashes around like an excited female at a party, and Shep has the air of a businessman about to sign a contract. Maeve is the color of autumn herself; perhaps setter red was given the first Irisher by the God of Autumn.

I may as well admit that we never, never crack and hull all the nuts we gather. The abundance of Nature's sweet open gift goes to my head and I simply stagger under bags and bags of nuts. But when it comes to getting the meat out of a butternut later on, it takes a special birthday-cake kind of occasion to bring me to the struggle. Hickory nuts are bad, too; the sweet, firm meat is channeled into the shell. I always think of Theseus in the labyrinth when I sit hunched over and chasing the nut in and out, and finally fish it up from the floor.

We crack them with a flatiron on a stone on the hearth, and on cool autumn evenings we bring in a bowl and decide to do a nice lot. I usually finish five or six nuts and measure in a cup to see if they could possibly be called a half cup added to the batter etc., etc. Meanwhile the apple-wood fire burns brightly and the music is good on the radio and a nice new copy of the latest Joseph Shearing is at hand—and the nuts can wait until another day!

By nature I am not a procrastinator. If there is anything I don't want to do, I usually rush to do it at once. I've found if I don't, I am mentally doing that unpleasant thing over and over and over. But cracking and shelling butternuts is my exception.

Nevertheless, up the hill I go, happy as a squirrel. "It seems a shame to waste them," I say to myself. "And what is better than a nut cake with a Mocha frosting?"

We have some hot clear days in which there is no feeling of urgency about getting ready for blizzard time, and then we have cold whipping-wind days which bring us to the storm-window frame of mind in a hurry.

Actually it is practical for country folk to do all the winter preparation before the days grow cold and gray. Painting the screens and putting them away, storing the lawn furniture, cleaning up the garden—there are dozens of things to do. Besides getting the wood stacked and the kindling cut for the long season of the fireplace.

But it's fun to do them, because the air is so brisk and fresh, and it is usually not too cold. It is on a crisp fall day that I plan to do over my desk, clean the attic, polish the silver. Catch up with all my mail. Brush all the dogs and the cats. Wash the blankets and spreads. I plan a month's work while I am eating breakfast in the sun on the terrace and watching the light break against the golden fire of the maples.

l then when I go up the road for the I expect something wonderful and ex-to be in the mailbox. I feel gay, in Only there is one moment every day
I feel my heart will break.

is moment is one I think all women and most men, too, when all the love-of life seems caught up at once and you ou can never bear to leave it. It may be you turn and look down a country starred with late wild asters and see own white house with the yard full of rs and the red gold of the old maples ıg above. It may be any one of a number nes, according to the life you have and ever dream is nearest your heart.
ıt there is the moment, and all the hearts and sorrow of your life suddenly nish and the fine, brave things stand
You breathe the sharp, clean air, your lift to the wideness of the sky.

nd for me, instead of being bowed down he memory of world woe, and various ndnesses I have experienced, and any ence of man's pettiness, I remember the of goodness. The woman who gave me only piece of milk glass, the man who ied my groceries to the car, the woman ne store who gave me her sugar ration in time because I had a birthday cake to te—there are thousands of little graces I add up, and all at once I know how ndid life is.

nybody has a store of great riches to add but some people are so busy totaling the es they have been "put upon" that they s them. Maybe those people never have t deep sadness when y consider that the red ves fall, the snow comes.
t most people experi-e the same feeling I ve, that quick immediperception that life is ewel in the hand—and a brilliant October
y I suddenly wish to live ever. These moments like a coin—with the loveliness on the e and the sadness on the reverse.

A picnic in October is especially lovely, ightened by the fact that it may be the
t. We went to Roxbury to the favorite ut stream this week and had lamb steaks lled. There is one thing all this huggerıgger about meat has done: We know we n have fine fare on whatever type of meat available. Braised short ribs came into my e only with meat troubles, so to speak.
ıd the sirloin or tea bone (I always think it as tea bone, not T bone) was replaced by al cutlets in barbecue sauce, or lamb eaks—cut from the end of the roast. We ıd frozen a couple of lamb roasts when ıey were on the market—and the lamb eaks were elegant.

We learned many new pleasant ways with ıicken, too, especially what the butcher elicately refers to as a fricassee fowl, meanıg it is too tough to be sold, actually, but ou can run your own risk.

One nice thing about simmering an old owl is the chicken stock left over—we use it dded to condensed soups instead of milk, nd in cream sauces, using half milk and half tock. One of my favorite recipes comes from Stove Pilot, the cookbook done by Maxwell Field Air Force Base wives. This recipe calls or cutting up a hen, rolling in seasoned flour ınd browning in hot shortening with a big lash of cayenne pepper. Then you remove :hicken and drain off most of the fat, then ry 1 large onion, 1 bell pepper, 1 clove garlic ıntil tender. Then add a No. 2 can tomatoes,
1 tablespoon curry, 1 tablespoon currants,
2 handfuls blanched almonds, 1 bay leaf.
Put chicken back and simmer in the sauce over low flame. Serve in a rice ring.

With a pressure cooker, the word "tough" has gone out of our vocabulary, whether it be old hen, less expensive cuts of beef or stewing meat. Everything cooked in a cooker is delicious, including rice, which I like best cooked that way.

With prices scooting like Roman candles, a good way to save money is to buy what you really need and cut the food bills as much as possible. Some of the new household gadgets are time and work saving and worth investing in, but some—naming no names—are just invitations to spend too much.

My favorite new invention is the bag that will keep hot things hot or cold things cold for hours. The fiber-glass insulation really works, and it is nice to have cold drinks for summer picnics and hot baked beans for later fall ones. It saves work and is easy to carry. And I love the new folding picnic table that keeps all the food off the grass and makes it possible for me to get a sandwich without standing on my head.

But I am attached to just a few old utensils for housekeeping that I wouldn't give up for any new ones. There is one paring knife that went through a great deal with me, and when someone opened a can with it and beheaded it, I felt very grieved. I kept on using the nub that remained until that got a little weak too. Then there is that cracked brown casserole.

I like furniture, too, that has been worn pleasantly; there are associations one has with certain pieces, the way I have with Honey's armchair. Perhaps that is one definition of home: a place where you live with as well as in a house.

We have been dragging down a lot of old Victorian gilded picture frames—the kind that surrounded Venetian scenes or Ruth at the Well—and painting them chalk white and using them for mirrors or prints. They make fine dressing-table tops if they are large enough, or tray frames.

It takes your enemy and your friend working together to hurt you to the heart; the one to slander you and the other to get the news to you. —MARK TWAIN.

We used to think it was dreadful the way our predecessors decorated everything with roses and daisies and bunches of ferns. But now in all the shops you find tulips and hearts and birds and ribbons painted all over—and they call it Pennsylvania Dutch or peasant style and everyone gets vastly excited over the new trend. I am sure this has some significance in American life, but I can't figure it out. I am too busy hunting for an old bread trough to use for autumn flower-and-fruit arrangements.

The cockers are getting heavier coats now, deep and glossy. They get a good bath on a sunny day and whirl around in the leaves drying off. Bathing Maeve, though, is an awful problem. For the first few baths, George was able to hoist her into the laundry tub where part of her could be in the water and part just overlap the edge. But now there is so much dog to her that we can't get her up there any more. I am regretting bitterly that I didn't buy that antique tin tub at the Olde Gift and Antique Shoppe. It would just fit her. Jill thinks we might rig up a washtub sequence in the yard with a bucket line, but Maeve is a very bouncy person for that. Pending the solution of her next bath, she gets brushed and her face is washed. Of course nearly every day she wallows in the brook awhile and brings back most of the brook's bottom soil.

Linda has helped her chase swallows all summer, and now they can catch drifting leaves, but it will be dull in winter with nothing up in the air to leap after.

Midmorning is the best time of day in October. White clouds foam in the sky, the washing blows clean and sunny on the line, the smell of harvest is still in the air, the cockers race in the leaves, the cats walk delicately on the fence top. The newest puppies, Hope and Robin, come lolloping up with a pair of good blue socks. Or a wine-colored bath towel they helped off the line.
We chose Robin Hood for the boy's name because he ate up everybody's food, a gay black bandit. And Hope—we tell her we hope she will make her Utility Dog degree when she is a lady.

The sun has a bright glitter on the red barn and the white house, and the leaves, the leaves are the best of all the color in the universe. This is a high, proud season, a time to work with contentment and fill the heart with beauty. THE END

QUICK AND EASYS for two

BY LOUELLA G. SHOUER

YOU'RE working into being an expert cook. Each week end you tackle a new cookery technique. You've come close to mastering pastry. You've even made your first praiseworthy biscuits, starting from scratch. But during the busy week it's the quickest and easiest route to dinner that is most practical for you to follow. You make your biscuits from a mix, if you have them at all.

Necessity's Child

Baked Hash Top Hat—Chili Sauce

Carrots and Green Beans

Three-Fruit Compote

Coffee

Oftentimes the most interesting meals are those produced on the spur of the moment, using just what you have on hand. You didn't do any shopping today, but you have a can of corned-beef hash. You're sick of frying it and serving with poached eggs. A forage in the salad pan turns up an onion and a green pepper. Why not bake the hash with top hats of onion and green pepper? A small portion of buttered carrots can be added to canned green beans; raisins and figs will give that dish of prunes new life. There, you've got a good little dinner.

BAKED HASH TOP HAT

Open 1 can corned-beef hash. Cut into thick slices. And here's a hint: if you keep corned-beef hash in the refrigerator, it slices easier; the chilling does it. Grease a layer-cake pan. Lay slices in it. Put a thin slice of onion and a ring of green pepper on each. Season lightly. Dot with butter or margarine. Bake in hot oven, 425°F. about 20 minutes or until browned. Serve with chili sauce.

THREE-FRUIT COMPOTE

If you have cooked prunes around, pit them, put them in a double boiler with the juice and add a handful of raisins and 4 or 5 figs, cut into pieces. Cook until raisins and figs are soft. Cool in pan of ice water (to make the cooling quicker). Serve with plain or sour cream. This combination makes a delicious whip another night, adding sugar and beaten egg white.

Spaghetti with Clam Sauce

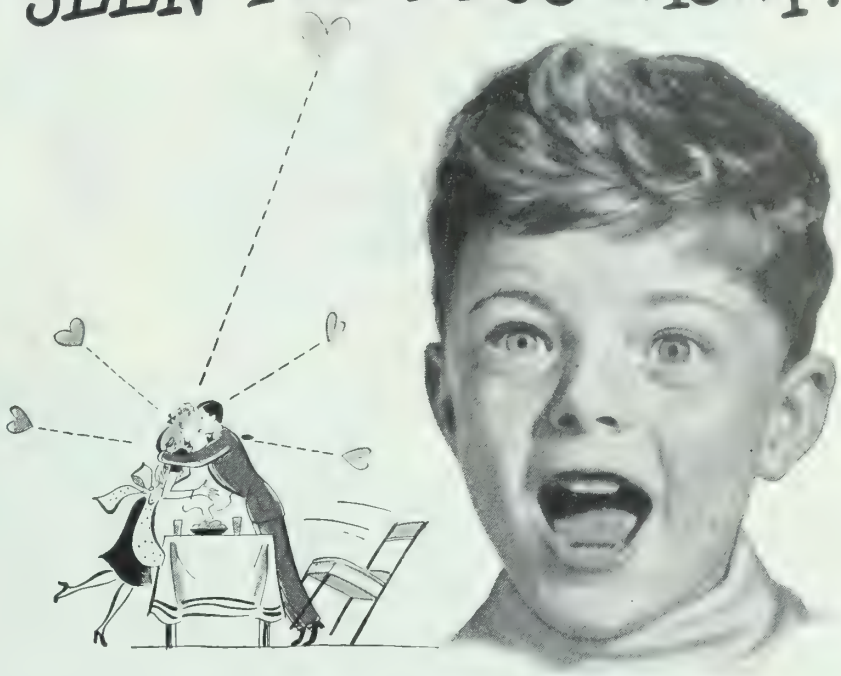
Green Salad

Fruit-and-Cheese Platter



Coffee

A repertoire of quick-to-make spaghetti sauces is a very good thing for quick-dinner cooks to have. Men never turn down spaghetti, and this kind of meal needs nothing more to complete it than a good salad, fruit and cheese. The sauce for this is so quickly made, it will be done by the time the spaghetti is boiled.

SPAGHETTI WITH CLAM SAUCE

Cook the thin spaghetti or spaghettini, which is even thinner, in boiling salted water until just tender—don't overcook or it will be mushy. Drain and heap on plates. Pour following sauce over spaghetti: Heat one 8-ounce can tomato sauce. Grate a portion of 1 clove garlic into it. Drain 1 can minced clams. Add clams and just enough of the juice to give the sauce a good consistency. Add 1 teaspoon salad oil, salt and pepper and a pinch of orégano. Simmer over low heat until ready to serve. Grated cheese may be served with the spaghetti if you like cheese on all spaghetti dishes, but it isn't usually served with the clam sauce. Anyway, you're having cheese and fruit for dessert. (Continued on Page 165)

"BOY, YOU SHOULD HAVE SEEN POP KISS MOM!"

Smacko! Right at the table, too. Naturally I said, "Yaah!" And Mom blushed.

"Listen here, young man," said Pop, "any time I want to kiss your Mom for being the best little cook in town I'll do it, see! Take a look at that fluffy, tasty rice. Makes your mouth water, doesn't it? That's rice fit for a rajah."

Then Mom spoke up. "And another thing," she said, "your new catcher's mitt came out of my budget savings. You can thank River Brand Rice* for that."

Ham with Almond Sauce

Cranberry Cabbage

Sautéed Sweet-Potato Slices

Sliced Bananas with Crushed Pineapple

Coffee

While ham, sweet potatoes and cranberries taste good any time of the year, they seem to have renewed appeal now that we're getting into tweed and sweater weather. Instead of serving these three in the same old way, give this little menu a whirl.

HAM WITH ALMOND SAUCE

Cut some of the fat off a ½-pound slice smoked ham. Snip the edges of the fat so it won't curl in the cooking. Grease a hot skillet with the fat you cut off. Brown ham on both sides. Turn down heat to cook ham through. Remove to hot platter. Fry ¼ cup slivered blanched almonds until golden brown in the fat in pan. Push to one side. Blend 1 tablespoon flour into fat. Add ¾ cup milk gradually. Stir constantly over medium heat until thickened. Season sauce with salt and pepper. Pour over ham.

CRANBERRY CABBAGE

Cut 1 slice bacon into pieces and sauté in saucepan. Add 1 apple, pared and cut into eighths, ½ onion, chopped, and ⅓ cup canned cranberry sauce. Shred ½ small head of red cabbage—about 3 cups. Add to other ingredients. Simmer ½ hour with ¼ cup vinegar, ¼ cup water, ¼ teaspoon salt and a dash of pepper.

For the sautéed sweet potatoes, use the canned ones. Split and sauté in butter or margarine. Combine sliced bananas and cold canned crushed pineapple for the dessert.

The California Way

Chicken-and-Corn Casserole

Hot Biscuits

Orange, Avocado and Persimmon Salad

Coffee

Meals consisting of a casserole dish and a good salad are part and parcel of the California way of living, but you don't have to live in California to enjoy either one. They are fireplace fare, for sure. Pull up your chairs.

CHICKEN-AND-CORN CASSEROLE

Slice or dice 1 cup cooked chicken. This is a good dish to have when you have had the chicken the day before and have some left. Or you could use canned chicken. Drain 1 can mushrooms—whole, sliced or the broken pieces. Open 1 can whole-kernel corn too. Measure ½ cup. Have some grated sharp American or Italian cheese handy and make the following sauce: Melt 3 tablespoons butter or margarine. Add 2 tablespoons flour. Blend smooth. Add 1 cup liquid—the juice from the canned mushrooms, chicken stock or chicken gravy, if you have it, and top milk or cream to fill out. Cook until thickened, stirring constantly. Season well with salt and pepper and a little grated onion. Sauté ½ cup cubed bread in butter or margarine and arrange in a layer on the bottom of casserole. Mix corn and mushrooms. Arrange chicken and vegetables in alternate layers on top, sprinkling each layer generously with grated cheese. Pour sauce over all and sprinkle with more cheese. Bake 15–20 minutes in a hot oven, 425° F.

ORANGE, AVOCADO AND PERSIMMON SALAD

Slice or section 2 oranges, slice ¼ peeled avocado and cut 1 ripe persimmon into wedges. Peel 1 onion. Slice and separate into rings. Arrange on a bed of greens. Toss with your best French dressing. Serve hot biscuits with the main dish and with the salad.

Friday-Night Special

Salmon Timbales

Spinach with Bacon

Applesauce Ginger Cookies

Coffee

It's the end of the week. Food money is on the short end. Tomorrow is shopping day. If you have a can of salmon, one of applesauce and one of spinach on your emergency shelf, you're all set. Canned salmon, frozen spinach and frozen applesauce make another threesome.

SALMON TIMBALES

Drain off fat and remove bone from a ½-pound can salmon. Flake fish fine. Add ¼ cup fine soft bread crumbs. Add 1 teaspoon lemon juice, a dash of hot pepper sauce and 3 tablespoons cream. Fold in 2 egg whites, stiffly beaten. Season to taste, and make it snappy. Grease 2 custard cups and fill with mixture. Set cups in pan of hot water. Bake 20–25 minutes in a moderate oven, 350° F. Serve with heated canned tomato sauce to which you've added chopped parsley. Lemon on the side is a good idea too.

SPINACH WITH BACON

Cook 1 package frozen spinach and chop it according to package directions. If you haven't time, use canned spinach, drained and chopped. Fry 2 slices bacon until crisp. Drain. Mix 2 teaspoons flour with 1 tablespoon bacon fat. Add a pinch of sugar, ¼ cup cream, stir until thickened. Combine with spinach. Add a dash of nutmeg, salt and pepper and grate a little lemon rind over it. Crumble the bacon and sprinkle over the top.

DESSERT

Buy thin crisp ginger cookies. Serve the frozen applesauce just thawed. If you use canned applesauce, have it chilled icy cold.

who are unsympathetic toward the Fort Knox notion that soldiers can be drilled without profanity. He will discover that some of the overage company commanders are crotchety and incompetent. But he will receive excellent food; not mom's, but this won't hurt him. He will not really be overworked. His hours will depend, of course, on his company and camp commanders. In general, though, he will get Saturday afternoons and Sundays off. The Army hopes to have such recreational facilities as sports, motion pictures and dances on a World War II standard, and also to make it possible for the soldier to further his education.

The educational programs were not, however, wholly successful even at the Fort Knox experiment. Unused to the physical exactions of the Army, the boys were simply too tired to do much studying.

One of the Fort Knox procedures to be incorporated into the new Army, and of inestimable value, is the attitude toward exposure to venereal disease. The Army's viewpoint has hitherto been completely cynical. It was held that soldiers were certain to run the risk of infection. Thus prophylaxis was made easily available and men who neglected to avail themselves of it were punished if they became diseased. But at Knox the chaplains and the medical officers united in telling their troops that continence was the only sure protection. The venereal-disease rate dropped astonishingly. But this grave matter, like all other details of Army life, will be in the hands of commanding officers. Again, the citizens' committee must check on their policies.

In due course enough medical officers and nurses will be found. And as in the case of their physical needs, the spiritual lives of the selectees will probably be well looked after. The nation's churches are not blind to the opportunity for missionary work at the expense of the Federal Government. But parents will avoid disillusionment if they accurately comprehend the duties and limitations of an Army chaplain. He is not a military man. His understanding of technical problems may be slight. He is a link in the chain of command. Even when palpable injustice is committed he may hesitate to interfere.

"We ought to be the conscience of the Army," my young chaplain said. "To put it another way, the chaplains should constitute His Majesty's opposition. We should oppose such injustices as drinking in the officers' clubs while hard liquor, and quite properly so, is denied the enlisted men.

"But it rarely works that way. The temptation to follow the Army line is great. Chaplains soon learn that they won't get into trouble if they do. The man who takes a dissenting position may forfeit his chances of promotion. He may be called a liberal, which is dangerous these days."

In so far as time and personnel permit, the Army will do its best to fit the new soldier into a job for which he had fitted himself in civilian life. This is not always possible. Vocational training is a minor matter in an organization geared to create fighting men.

Many skills, as the Army itself points out, have extremely limited use in a military machine. The selectees will, on the other hand, have almost unprecedented opportunities to become officers, so great is the need. Any soldier may ask for transfer to an Officers' Training Camp. If he meets the requirements he will be commissioned and serve the balance of his twenty-one months as an officer.

What will Johnny's fellow soldiers be like? The draft law provides that the "physically, mentally or morally deficient or defective" are to be deferred. It appears, though, that this will be interpreted in the broadest possible way. Raving lunatics, obviously, will not be inducted and neither will helpless cripples. But Congress insisted that imprisonment for a criminal offense is not a bar to service unless the term was for more than a year. Some fairly despicable crimes, it might be noted, receive sentences of less than twelve months. Congress also directed, contrary to the convictions of many Army officers, that 70 points were to constitute the passing grade in the General Classification Test, as the aptitude examination is called.

When an army mobilizes for war it is forced to lower its intelligence standards sharply. But in time of peace, however dubious, the number of effective troops is increased by raising the level. The Army fixed a passing grade of 80 soon after V-J Day. This is not particularly high. The General Classification Test is an examination into the ability to learn. An average man is rated 100, a very good one 150 and a bad one 50. Millions of soldiers have been tested. Among those below 80, the Army has learned, the venereal rate is higher. So are absences without leave, desertions and other offenses.

DANGER that selective service may fail, if public support and vigilance are lacking, does not lie in hard work for the new young soldiers or even in exposure to an occasional jailbird. It rests on the chance that the high principles voiced by General Bradley and others will be lost in the military labyrinths.

"I do not hesitate to acknowledge," the Chief of Staff said recently, "the many imperfections of a military system—imperfections which too often have broken the spirit of the individual and hidden his abilities beneath bureaucracy and rank."

The people who suffer because they are misunderstood would suffer a good deal more if they were understood.

—WILLIAM FEATHER:
Haystacks and Smokestacks,
(William Feather Co.)

General Bradley has sent down word that the selectees are to be permitted "the most liberal exercise of their personal freedoms within the limits of authority required for the performance of their duties." This pleasant, soft-spoken Chief of Staff will do everything he can to see that his instructions are obeyed. He told me that he planned to visit every cantonment and address the officers and noncommissioned officers. Being Chief of Staff carries with it, however, an almost impossible burden of responsibilities.

Many regular Army officers outspokenly regard such policies of decent treatment and personal freedom as nonsense. Some of them disapproved of the teacher-enlisted man system attempted at Fort Knox. They said that men so gently trained would not stand up under the horrors of combat. The problem which now confronts the Army, and the parents of America, is eliminating such officers from the training program. The job will not be easy. Congress unwisely rejected the proposal for a civilian check on training centers and Army personnel which was recommended by the Compton Committee and was provided in the act which would have created universal military training last year.

Under its terms the Army was to have complete control of the military program, but funds were to be handled by a civilian commission to which civilian inspectors would report. Their most important function, the Compton Committee declared, would be "to provide an avenue through which any individual in training may submit complaints with assurance that they will be promptly considered by someone outside the operating agency under whose jurisdiction he falls." The inspectors were also to check on possible abuses in the camps.

Had there not been this provision for civilian supervision, I am informed on the highest authority, the Compton Committee would not have supported universal military training last year. The Army, gagging perceptibly, had to swallow it. When some degree of outside control was suggested for selective service, however, the proposal was killed by Army brass. UMT, it was argued, was merely a training program, distinct from the regular Army. The selectees would be merged with troops. Civilian commissars at any Army post, one general snorted with wrath, was sheer communism. On the other hand, another general said that he could handle them without difficulty.

"I'd give those fellows plenty to drink, stage regimental reviews in their honor, make them feel like big shots and not show them a thing," he explained.

So today's Joe, in accordance with Army tradition, has nowhere to turn if he is unjustly treated. True, court-martial regulations have been somewhat liberalized. An enlisted man can now demand that a percentage of his fellow G. I.'s sit on the court which tries him. It is further provided that the soldier who believes he has been unfairly punished by his commanding officer can "through the proper channel, appeal to the next higher authority." Any veteran of either World War will agree that this right is just about worthless. All veterans know that commissioned personnel tend to protect one another. The "proper channel" is likely to be no channel at all.

American distaste for Army life was demonstrated in the fall of 1941 after, by a single vote in the House of Representatives, the drafted men who had been promised only one year in the Army were continued in service. Ominously, on latrine walls, the word OHIO began to appear. It stood for Over the Hill in October, meaning that some troops intended to desert. They were unquestionably a small minority. Then the war clouds darkened and the attitudes of the men became adjusted to the grim task ahead.

The average American boy's resentment is largely the fault of the military. At a recent press conference at the Pentagon the Department of the Army stated baldly that the "Army has no caste system in any true sense." Such a statement is, of course, utter foolishness. The boys being called up are not idiots. Neither are their older brothers, cousins and friends who served in World War II. They have doubtless been told about the elegant châteaux where the generals lived in the utmost luxury in the European theater and nearly everywhere else. They know that enlisted men often did the housework for the brass. They have heard about the elaborate cocktail parties and the hard liquor shipped abroad in dearly needed cargo space. They know how the officers, all too often, monopolized the Red Cross girls and inevitably the pretty nurses who had commissioned status themselves. They remember the private motion-picture shows and the seats reserved for officers at post theaters.

No intelligent soldier resents obeying orders, saluting or according respect to rank. He bitterly objects to the special privileges, apart from all that, which the officer enjoys. The Army would be well advised, for example, to forbid the consumption of liquor at officers' clubs. G. I.'s are severely punished if intoxicants are found in their barracks. But when I questioned one general who had trained a division on the Pacific Coast on this subject he looked astonished.

"If I hadn't permitted my officers to drink at the club," he said, "they would have gone into town to do it. Then they might have disgraced their uniforms in public. At the club, I could control them."

The enlisted men, of course, do their dri ing in public. The implication of this di ional commander was very clear: enlis men aren't gentlemen and it doesn't mat how they act.

Men's natures do not change appreciat when they put on a uniform. Innate in t young American is his conviction that he as good as anybody else, that he eats a drinks where he pleases and goes dancin with any girl who will have him.

When the draft became law it was specifi that eighteen-year-old boys, who chose enlist, might serve only a year instead twenty-one months. The boys soon flood the recruiting stations, where they learne that this was less than accurate. Followin the year they must spend six more years the National Guard or some other reserv component. The branch will not be of the own choosing, either. They will be ordered t duty.

Nonetheless, far more boys are seeking t enlist than the quota of about 10,000 month permits. I talked with scores of ther at headquarters in New York, Boston an Washington when re cruiting began in July
Not a single one ex pressed any othe motive than to ge the unpleasant busi ness over as soon a possible.

"I decided to give one year instead o
two," was the stand ard remark. "One's bad enough."

In World War II
the Army spent enor mous sums, never quite successfully, to convince the troops of the justice of their cause and to explain the meaning of the war. That was when Germans and Japa nese were killing Americans, when the soldiers faced the prospect of being killed themselves. It will again conduct in formation and educa tion programs. But with relative peace, the job is going to be infinitely more diffi cult. The Army will be deceiving itself grievously if it thinks any large proportion of the new soldiers, selectees or volunteers, has willingly entered its ranks. It will err sadly if it believes that the seeds of resentment are not already sown and may flourish with speed. I am confident that General Bradley is aware of this. He has ordered the officers who will command the camps to co-operate in every possible way with local advisory committees.

"Leadership in a democratic army," the Chief of Staff has said, "means firmness, not harshness; understanding, not weakness; justice, not license; humaneness, not intolerance; generosity, not selfishness; pride, not egotism."

These are lofty ideals, rarely achieved in a military machine or, for that matter, anywhere else. Who is to see that a sincere effort to carry them out is made; not by General Bradley, but by a host of generals, colonels, captains and sergeants? The citizens of the areas where the training camps are situated must do the job, with or without the pledged Army co-operation. This means work, a lot of work.

The local editor must assign his very best reporter to the cantonment. He must fearlessly publish any examples of incompetence or abuse. He must make confidential reports to Washington, if this seems the wiser course. The minister must make sure that the boys really receive proper spiritual guidance. The businessmen must subscribe funds for recreational facilities in the town. The police must suppress houses of ill fame near the camp.

Two Days

More rapturous and far more gay
Than any other sort of day

Are two that children celebrate,
All unmindful of the date.

And one of them is born of mist,
The other blue and amethyst.

One of them is crisp and cold,
The other marked with marigold.

Two days dissimilar and still,
They each unfold a miracle,

For one's the final day of school
When all good-bys are beautiful;

The other brings the hushed hello
That heralds the first fall of snow.

They must enforce the liquor laws, particularly with respect to minors.

More important than anything else, perhaps, the women of the surrounding country must throw open their homes. For the new soldiers are not, in the traditional American sense, peacetime soldiers. They are not garrison troops. They are a cross-section of the nation. They have left good homes and good jobs. They have sacrificed comfort and most of their personal freedoms. They have put aside school and college. They must be treated, if selective service is to work, with the same high regard as though they faced immediate battle.

SEARCH FOR A SOUL

very blue eyes like fairy flax, silvery-white hair and pink cheeks. He spoke in a low voice, took me for long walks and taught me to look at every flower we passed. He answered all my questions. No doubt he spoiled me; and I was already spoiled, for I cannot remember having any friction whatever with any grown-up person until the dreadful day when my mother vanished, leaving us in the hands of a fiend, whom I had already once met in the drawing room.

I am surprised that my mother, generally a shrewd judge of character, should have been taken in by the false, cloying manners of Miss—we will call her "Smith." My mother was pleased with her excellent testimonials, and thankful that she was at least a partially trained nurse. She was to take us to three cousins until my parents returned in the spring. Within a year of her leaving us she became the permanent inmate of a mental hospital. Sane—while we were in her care those terrible five months—she was certainly not.

Miss Smith was a confirmed sadist, and she set to work immediately to torture the three little girls left in her care. When I cried she used to throw me—in the depths of winter—into ice-cold baths. She whipped us with or without the slightest provocation. She tied my always exemplary sister Mary to the legs of tables. Every night, when she came up to bed, she tickled me till I went nearly out of my mind with excitement, terror and sheer hatred.

The cousins lived a detached and ceremonious existence in a distant part of the house. Wilmett behaved throughout this period like a heroine from history. She was only nine years old, but she confronted the three unbelieving cousins with long and perfectly accurate histories of our tortures. She withstood Miss Smith, in the more terrible of her very ferocious tempers, to the face. She fought her like a wildcat when she beat me, until Miss Smith preferred to practice her orgies only behind my sister's back. Wilmett was punished, she was deprived of privileges, but she never gave up trying to defend us.

At last Miss Smith played into Wilmett's hands. She had punished Mary by putting her legs into scalding-hot water till they blistered, then she hastily covered them with black woollen stockings and her legs became inflamed. Wilmett now had proof for her tales. She succeeded in dragging the least incredulous of the three cousins to look at Mary's legs. A doctor was summoned and Mary was asserted to be very ill, as no doubt she was: sick with fear as well as with actual blood poisoning. For some mysterious reason, the cousins failed even then to dismiss Miss Smith; but the worst of our physical tortures decreased from that hour.

The cousins took to popping into the nursery at unexpected intervals. Mary was no longer tied to table legs, nor do I suspect that I was given again the "trial by water," or even at all severely beaten; but never for one moment did my fears, my hate, my appalled conviction of something wholly against nature in charge of us subside.

It only shows to what depths of cowardice a rule of terror can reduce almost any helpless and exposed human being, let alone a child, that when my mother returned home, only my courageous sister, Wilmett, dared tell her the truth. Mary and I funked the whole business. Miss Smith went—but not until she had been told what my mother and father thought of her.

The sun soon shone again with its accustomed splendor. My mother had made a good recovery. Whatever rifts had appeared in the joy of her love had been completely healed by my father's anxious care. She knew she had his whole, unchanged heart, and for a while this satisfied her. For a year and a half, till that hot, long summer when the wells dried up, and Victoria had her Golden Jubilee, I do not remember the faintest family shadow upon the blue horizon.

My mother's health flagged during the long, hot Jubilee summer. Nor did the birth of my mother's last child, George, in September, do anything to restore her health. She discovered the village under the Berkshire downs was too damp and bleak to live in, so my father gave up this well-loved parish, a bad thing for a young clergyman, however brilliant, to do, and accepted a damper, if not bleaker, living under the Quantock Hills.

Over Stowey was the real home of my heart. The rectory garden was much vaster than the Fawley garden, and Ado had a greenhouse, and a paddock, let alone a stable and a stableyard.

We now possessed a donkey called Fanny who lived to an incredible age from sheer obstinacy. A shy and well-bred mare called Skylark was lent to us for a happy but breathless period.

Even the nursery was larger than the Fawley nursery and had more windows, with a magnolia tree trained under one of them. The church was a beautiful old Somersetshire church just across the road, and I never hear a chime of bells that does not carry me back into the old stone porch full of expectation of what I might find there.

I am afraid it was not God I was looking for, for at the age of six I suddenly became a complete skeptic. This sudden overthrow of my faith was the result of being informed by my sister, Wilmett, that there were no fairies. No fairies, I said fiercely to myself, then no God! Whatever inhabited the heaven and influenced the sun I had hitherto dumped together and accepted as solidly and with as much conviction as the bread and butter on my plate at teatime.

It was always difficult not to believe Wilmett. She spoke as one with authority. Her sense of responsibility was so great, her innate dignity so dire, that I knew well she would not have trifled with a lie to save her life. There could be no fairies if Wilmett said there were not. There could be no God—no infant Jesus—no galaxy of heaven; it was a great shock. I liked saying my prayers, I liked Bible picture books and their graphic stories. I particularly enjoyed sitting on a footstool at my mother's feet while she read to me—over and over again at my express desire—the story of the Holy Innocents. It is true that I continued to say my now colorless prayers, and willingly attended frequent church services, but these were mere concessions to good and devoted parents.

No one but Lizzie knew that I was now an atheist. I told her about it in the kitchen in return for a cake fresh from the oven, but as Lizzie did not appear to take much notice of it, I told no one else. Nevertheless, it made a great deal of difference to my inner consciousness. Up to six years old I had literally never been frightened by anything in the outside world. I saw no reason for fear, since God or my guardian angel was obviously preoccupied with the question of my personal safety; now I realized that I was on my own in a most precarious universe. A hideous storm of terror took possession of me at this period, as if to show me how dreadful a place a Godless world can be.

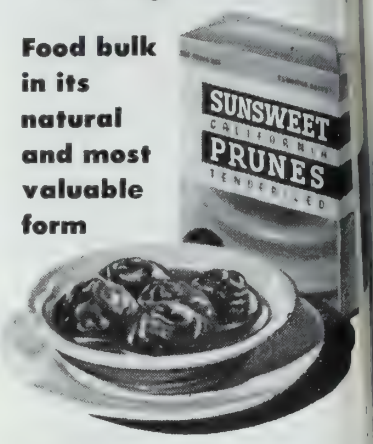
No doubt Somersetshire boys are no worse than any other boys, but they were in these remote days stupider—and since more stupid, more cruel. One Sunday on the roadside I discovered a group of young louts torturing a long slowworm by burning it to death with matches. I ordered them to stop, and as they saw no reason why they should stop, I danced in front of them screaming and yelling. So violent and piercing were my cries that they reached Lizzie in the kitchen, who dashed to my rescue. She soon disposed of the boys and let the poor remains of the slowworm wriggle off into tailless security.

However, the incident did not end in personal triumph. After dinner I was told to take a pudding across the fields to an old woman who lived quite near and liked her Sunday pudding from the rectory. There were no obvious dangers between the paddock and the old woman's cottage and I reached it in safety. I then prepared to return the way I had come, but what I had all along secretly feared took place. The boys were there at the bottom of the field between me and the paddock. They were standing on the bank of a muddy pool we called "The Pond," which was the boundary between our domain and the outer world. This time neither Lizzie nor Ado was within call. I was alone in a hostile universe with six monstrous louts threatening to take their revenge upon me by throwing me into the yellow, scum-covered pond. The pond, I knew, was incalculably deep; and what was even worse than death, my dignity was at their mercy. I knew that I was personally helpless. I only had deep within me the sense that I was for some inexplicable and mysterious reason more important than they were. They hated me; they jeered and threatened me. They wanted to treat me as they had treated the worm. Nor did I see any particular reason for their failing to carry out their wishes. I couldn't expect the Holy Ghost feeling I had about my special importance to occur to them. Yet it was my only defense. I did not expose my fear. I would not turn back, neither would I hasten my steps. I would cross the field, passing close by them, till I reached the paddock, then I should have to turn my back on them, which would be the worst of all, while I walked up the paddock to the garden gate.



Being by nature a confirmed pessimist, I did not expect to escape my doom. I walked straight toward the jeering boys, crossed the field past the horrible yellow pond and into the paddock. I had to turn my back then, and could no longer see what my enemies were doing, but I reached the gate in astonishing safety. I got inside it. They still shouted after me—but from another world now. I was out of their power, and I ran. When I reached the nursery I was breathless and exhausted. The nurse remarked on my paleness; had I, she demanded, fallen down and hurt myself? Had anything happened to me? I shook my head. Nothing had happened to me. Only for the first time in my life I had been afraid, helplessly afraid, without protection and without power. Probably there is no feeling so horrible as impotent fear against a fellow man.

From that hour I hated boys. Not known boys, since my few male acquaintances were completely innocuous and even friendly specimens, but boys in the abstract. I hated because I feared; and not until I ceased to fear because I loved did I discover that part of the origin of my hate was my own arrogance.

The difficulty in writing truthfully about parents is that the tone of criticism or the flavor of sentimentalism is bound to creep in. Parents are an excellent alibi: "I might have done better if only my parents had understood me—brought me up more wisely—given me a more suitable education," and so on; though it is often to be found that another member of the same family has turned out, notwithstanding all these obstacles, very well indeed. Devoted sons and daughters can also make an alibi of their devotion—so as to explain why they preferred to descend through history as examples of filial piety rather than to do their job of work in the less appreciative outside world.

I shall have to unmask my parents psychologically in the same manner that I unmask myself; but I hope to show—what I myself believe—that they were in many ways above the average of human beings and excellent parents. They were certainly uncommonly enlightened in the bringing up of their children, considering the age in which they lived. They were born, my father in 1851 and my mother in 1853.

My mother herself was wholly unequipped for real life. As a child she was taught nothing useful; she was treated with great personal unkindness. Her father died when she was five years old; her mother left her children chiefly to nurses and governesses, and she was brought up in an extremely rich, religious and sporting family. Everything was done for her that she ought to have been taught to do for herself; and everything was expected of her that she had not been trained to perform.

Fear was the natural result of this inadequate training; and this fear—though she tried to make up for it by the depth and strength of her love for us—she handed on to her children.

My father was definitely better equipped for life than my mother. He was the eldest of four sons, and—born into a poor clergyman's family—had early in life to set to work to help his mother. What he mainly suffered from was an oversevere, probably jealous, young father, and a mother of quite peculiar dynamic power, who made him her best friend.

Religion was his main interest, but his religion was a wholly different, and far more personal and emotional, kind than my mother's. My grandmother, Margaret MacDonald Bottome, was the most vigorous and impassioned Christian I have ever met; and it was therefore natural that my father's religion should be of a strong, emotional and active kind. He was at all times prepared to clothe the naked, feed the hungry, visit the sick or those in prison, and help anyone who was in need. More than this, he did it with a vim and a profound, eager tenderness such as I have seldom come across.

Sadness is a wall between two gardens. —KAHLIL GIBRAN: The Prophet (Alfred A. Knopf, Inc.).

He had many faults, and they often appeared to my strict and nervous mother to be dark abysses of moral danger. He was careless, convivial, full of a sort of fun that only one in ten of the people he met appreciated. I think that my mother always thought that he ought to take life more seriously, though during the first years of her release from her own stern and strenuous life she was very glad he didn't.

The real difficulty of their married life may have been that my father missed too greatly the tremendous demonstrative strength of his mother's love, its generosity and its perpetual stimulus—which my mother was quite unable to give him. She expected instead the constant encouragement of a warm and persistent care—a glorified nurse-lover—and this my father was too manly and natural a human being to be able to provide. My father and mother's love was the one lasting devotion of a lifetime, but it was, after the first delight and release of its early years, an increasing tragedy in which all their children shared.

Until my late teens I looked on my mother as an image of unmitigated perfection; as regards my father, I fear even from the first I was slightly critical, though affectionate. When I was five years old I began to find flaws in his character. He was incalculable. Why, for instance, did he tell me that if I wanted to catch birds I had only to put salt on their tails, and then resent the result of this misleading information?

Naturally I had believed him. I took salt—unfortunately, in his favorite silver salt spoons—on my afternoon walk, and in the heat of the chase I lost the salt spoons. But was this a reason for such a sharp and unintelligible scolding? I retired under the gooseberry bushes, where I had found an inviolable retreat, and wept bitterly.

He taught me spelling, and again this fierce and unfair antagonism rose up between us. He asked me to spell "mention." To help me, he said very plainly, "M—e—n."

"Men," I quickly answered.

"Now," he said, "the rest is easy—'tion.'"

"S-h-o-n-e," I haltingly replied.

His great brows met, his fierce eyes glared, he called me—a reproach I particularly resented—"stupid."

I do not think my father understood children. Perhaps he was a little jealous of them. He always called us my mother's children, and left us almost wholly to her unflagging attention. But when he was needed in any conspicuous way—and this did happen—he never failed us.

The one of us who needed and loved him most, and to whom he showed a careful tenderness, was Mary. Mary, who was the second girl in the family, when a boy was hoped for, came barely fourteen months later than Wilmett, before my mother had recovered from a very tedious first birth. My mother did not want her; could not nurse her; and never gave her the understanding which she gave to the rest of us. Perhaps the death of a boy child later made her turn Mary into a sort of scapegoat for her sorrow; but the treatment she gave this exceedingly pretty and highly interesting second daughter did the child, as a human being, untold harm, and was indeed bad for the whole family. Without blaming my mother, whom we all regarded—as my father himself regarded her—as an angel, I began to notice the difference in Mary's treatment when I was between five and six years old. I did not consciously say to myself, "Mother is unkind to Mary," but I thought with a disturbed and unhappy sympathy that Mary seemed dogged by disaster. It is interesting that though Mary was constantly blamed and scolded, I never believed that she had done wrong. Children are very difficult to fool.

When I was told that we were going to America to live I saw the gates of Paradise open without the hint of a fiery sword between us and the Tree of Life. I am sorry to say that my sense of bliss was not decreased by learning that my sisters must remain behind in boarding school until our new home was ready to receive us.

I think my mother was not at all averse to this new plunge. She had twice visited America, and each time it had been a great personal triumph. She did not realize that on this occasion she would have to face a new home and an adjustment to a new, and by no means effortless, existence.

My mother had never had to run a house with fewer than three servants. She could neither cook, sew nor housecleanse. She was trained to be waited on from her birth, and she had never had any other kind of training. To be delicate and to be a saint were her achieved aims. She was worshiped by her husband and children; and she had cut herself off almost entirely from her own relations, with whom she had never been able to get on.

It was February in 1890 when we sailed to the New World. Every child discovers a new world at the dawn of each fresh day, so that it is less startling to a child than it might be to a grown-up person to wake up one fine morning in a new country.

America seemed rather to slide into me, than to shock me. We landed on a bright, cold, February day. There was more noise than I had ever heard before. London growled, but New York mingled roars with screams. Nothing remained, or apparently could keep, still. Until our new house at Yonkers was finished we had to remain in the rather stuffy hotel bedrooms and sitting room into which we had been genially pushed on our arrival.

My first American school was a day school, and every hour was filled by quite extraordinarily amusing work which appeared to me purely in the light of play. We danced, sang, molded in clay and wielded fret saws while learning history and geography, and even arithmetic. My teacher was young and very kind to me. I was allowed to say "bean" instead of "bin" when referring to the past participle of "to be." "She doesn't mean any harm by it," our teacher told the rather indignant class. "It's just the way she's been brought up."

I think our home life, though our house itself must have been unpleasant, was very happy during the year we spent at Yonkers. My mother for a time had distinctly better health. I think, too, that alone with my father and her two youngest, my mother was more adjustable and singlehearted than when the elder ones joined her. She must have had to face—and faced extremely bravely—harder living conditions than she ever had to face again. She never attempted to get a nurse, and what I couldn't do, she did for both of us, as well as superintending her household.

It is true George and I were off her hands from nine o'clock till seven, except Saturdays and Sundays; but we were never off her heart or out of her mind. Her children were her life—and she obstinately refused any other life. I doubt if a better mother for young children ever existed. But my father still had to manage his parish without the slightest assistance from her, socially or otherwise. Nevertheless, he made a great success of Yonkers. His church filled to the brim, and I always remember him during those five years of our American life as laughing. His parents and brothers often came to see him at Yonkers, and he, more often still, went into New York to see them.

It is true that my mother did not like Yonkers; but then, she didn't have to stay there permanently. My father had been offered the

I retired into that role immediately; and indeed I do not know why I ever came out of it. Partly it may have been a wish to maintain a physical ascendancy of some kind over my brother George; but more probably I was secretly refusing my role as a woman, because my mother had made it too unpalatable for me.

The next event that happened to us at Yonkers was the return of the sisters. Wilmett and Mary had been away from us for six months.

My father and mother were, of course, radiantly happy at the safe arrival of their two elder daughters. Wilmett and Mary, now fourteen and twelve and a half, were pretty girls with large dark eyes, sweeping black locks and clear complexions. I can remember a dress that Wilmett acquired in which she looked quite ravishing. As by now I knew half the children of Yonkers, it gave me great pleasure to go about surreptitiously pointing her out and saying, "Look—that's my sister, Wilmett!"

As a matter of fact, I loved Mary far better than Wilmett, but she was less spectacular.

I don't think Wilmett ever really liked America. Probably she came too late to it with her British habits too firmly fixed. Also by now my mother must have been privately deciding against the American scene, and would certainly have shared her distaste with her eldest daughter.

MARY, on the other hand, took a deep root in American life, and just as I did, soon discovered that her sense of personal worth and the chances ahead of her widened in every direction.

From this period dates, though only in a shadowy way, the breakup of our family unity. In one camp were my mother, Wilmett and George; in the other, my father and Mary. I was not wholly in either camp. My mother remained the center of my interest, but while Wilmett was unable to change or even to shake the tie between us, her presence was very disturbing. Before

This was in itself a tragedy of ...olly unnecessary kind; but it led to a far greater tragedy, since my mother turned her vivid imagination into a means of setting Wilmett and me against my father. She had forfeited the power to do this with Mary, and George was too young to be influenced consciously by her attitude of disapproval; but her power over Wilmett and me was supreme. For years she sapped the love and the respect of the two children who had most natural affinity with my father. She undermined our confidence in him, and darkened his pleasure and pride in us as a father.

Whenever a neurotic person wants an excuse for his own weakness he finds it essential to build up a case against his life partner. This acts as an alibi for his own refusal to accept the duties of life. How many children's hearts have been undermined and discouraged by these fatal and misleading parental confidences. All my Jamaica life I was puzzled by the fact that outside my home my father was a glorious and adored being, praised and admired by everyone I met; while under his own roof he was an outlaw, and at times even a criminal.

Being a woman is a terribly difficult task, since it consists principally in dealing with men. —JOSEPH CONRAD.

If he were an outlaw had I not a secret feeling: that only a little farther down the road I might become—or perhaps already secretly was—an outlaw with him?

Fifty years ago, summers in America were taken very seriously. Schools closed the first week in June and did not reopen till the end of September. Life unbent in every direction. Those who could afford sea or mountains went to them. Men deposited their wives in summer hotels or cottages, and came and went for long week ends.

We seemed to have left Jamaica in another world when we reached Quogue, Long Island. I think my father fondly thought it would make up for all that my mother had suffered and reconcile her to American life.

I ve never been back to Quogue since three ecstatic summers that seemed at me to enclose eternal bliss, but I have old that the empty, rather featureless sland beaches facing the Atlantic have ecome fashionable and thickly popu- summer resorts. But in my childhood e, Southampton and Easthampton ery sparsely inhabited. A tennis club, ly a church, a few hostels and a hand- summer cottages comprised what life was. The beach was a mile and a half from us, and large crowded stagecoaches etween our house and the sea.

beach itself was unutterable bliss. I s thought it was extremely foolish of mily to refuse to allow me to learn to I had no fear of the Atlantic—this, in was their ground for not allowing me to —but I was in far more danger without rt of swimming than with it, for as I ht nothing of the waves, I very often aught off my feet by them, and carried f my depth, and more than once was y drowned in consequence.

thing in salt water has always seemed one of the most perfect physical sensa- known to man; but of course it should st of under- ling and mak- se of the laws e sea. Not to able to dive, and float with- onsciousness of t is a deplorable e of time and rtunity.

y memory of beach at Quogue at the weather always fine; the inexhaustibly geable; and the r people on it— uding the other dren—inexpli- y pleasant and l. Usually our began at the nnis Club. her, Wilmett all the uncles e members, so t we had a right entry into this rosanct abode, ugh there again we were discouraged from nes of skill by never being allowed upon tennis courts. However, as we arrived y early in the morning when the croquet ns were empty, we were allowed to play on them until the grownups came. Mary I became highly proficient at this game d were lifted to the realms of bliss by being ken on as partners by the uncles.

During those Quogue summers we had no mal education, but we were exposed to ghly intelligent and friendly grown-up peo- . My three uncles were all under thirty ars of age and one or another of them was ways more or less involved in a romance.

Of the private events of my Uncle George's e I knew nothing at the time. He was ex- emely reserved and confided in no one. He oked, however, very sad; he was often a lit- stern, but his conversation was well worth e entire attention of any listening child. e had more wit than his three brothers, ough almost no lightness of heart, and uld quote from memory pages from major minor poets.

HARRY, the youngest, and my brother eorge's favorite on account of his athletic rowess, was barely twenty-one. He and my ther were the most rowdy of the four broth- rs, and I privately thought Harry a trifle rutal and beneath the dignity of an uncle. should have been astonished had anyone old me he was destined to become my life- ng, perhaps my best friend.

Uncle Frank was devoted to my mother nd had always believed that he could in time ure her of all her ailments; he was, through hose long summers at Quogue, slowly begin- ing to believe that not only could he not restore her health—but that since she was not discoverably ill, she could never be made discoverably well. None of this came through to me as a child, except perhaps what was the secret source of the whole failure. I felt perfectly conscious of Wilmett's antagonism to Uncle Frank—and that both of them, devoted as they were to my mother, wanted completely different things for her. I believe that Uncle Frank, so wise and kind—so, in a sense, modern—might have helped my mother toward an improved state of health had it not been for the tug of war that took place between him and Wilmett.

WILMETT, robbed of her English life, and feeling her prestige as the eldest child taken from her in America, reacted very badly to our American life. She was too old to play with other children, too young to become a "young lady." At sixteen she was neither out of school nor in any available social swim. She felt isolated, at a loose end, and an enemy in a hostile land. My mother's ill health was her only excuse for her overwhelming urge for power. She really needed my mother's illnesses; and here was Uncle Frank taking—or trying to take—them away from her. Worse than this, I was his favorite niece and I was Wilmett's bête noire. Moreover, during Wilmett's absence in England, my mother had come to lean on Uncle Frank as she used to lean on Wilmett.

I do not now see what Wilmett could do, other than what she proceeded to do: undermine Uncle Frank's influence over my mother by hook and by crook. Had they co-operated, they might between them have saved my mother; but, as they were divided against each other, their antagonism merely helped to destroy her.

There are certain events in human relationships which, hardly noticed at the time, can be of lifelong significance. Such a happening took place between my sister Wilmett and myself during our first summer at Quogue.

Wilmett was fifteen and I was barely nine. My mother was ill, and our newly arrived Finnish cook vanished overnight; no one could be found to take her place, and for ten of the hottest days Wilmett ran our household of ten persons almost single-handed.

It was not surprising that under the stress of this ordeal, which she carried through with triumphant success, she should have been more irritable than usual; nor that my careless, lighthearted ways, always provoking to her, should have provoked her to distraction. I cannot remember what dire event produced the cataract of reproach and rage which finally broke over me; I only know that I, too, was unnerved by heat and exhaustion, and that her scalding words hurt me unbearably. I was at all times a rare crier and I never cried in public, so that I slipped away from her dry-eyed and silent, to find some private spot in which to indulge my woe. I lay face downward on the bed, sobbing my embittered heart out.

I did not hear the door open, but I heard a gasp of horror, and turning my head, I saw Wilmett looking down at me. She sank on her knees by the bedside imploring me to tell her what was wrong. I was too far down the road of my despair to attempt a subterfuge. "I can't bear it any more," I sobbed. "You're too cruel to me I want to die." I certainly did not expect what did happen. Wilmett burst into tears and, throwing her arms round me, implored my forgiveness.

I was too startled to cry any more. I simply stared at the beautiful agonized face while I listened, as if to a fairy tale, to her dramatic statements of affection.

It was unbelievable. She had, so she told me, a peculiar and tender affection and pride in me.

I understood then that in my heart, too, there had been more love than hate. I had admired her only too much; it was the feeling that I could not please her which had made me defy her. She was my unrealizable ideal. I couldn't, of course, explain this to her, but I could tell her that I loved her. Joy and harmony swept over our troubled spirits.

Wilmett would never, she promised, be angry again; and I would never be exasperating. We planned the future of our new relationship. Wilmett would stop ordering me about, and I, understanding the reasonableness of her wishes, would no longer flout them.

Only with the sunset, poor tired beautiful Wilmett, provoked again, forgot her certitude. Another, an even more passionate, cascade of scolding descended upon my head. I had not even done what she thought I had this time. I looked at her with astonished eyes. I tried to find courage to explain, but at the anger burning in her eyes, at the high sound of her ranting, once more my defensive hostility swept in front of my heart. I would not explain—I would not show her my love! I was too proud to fight!

It was not the last time that Wilmett made an emotional appeal to my heart, but it was the last time I ever let her in. I could not give her what she asked henceforward because something in me refused to believe in the sincerity of her appeals.

I think now that I was unjust and cowardly not to launch myself once more upon the sea of emotional surrender. Wilmett was dramatic-hearted, and her sincerity, acute if not lasting, could not shine out in any other way. She was generous and I was niggardly of emotion. I asked too little and for too long; and Wilmett perhaps too much and for too short a time.

There was six years between us. She was an authoritative, reliable eldest child and I was an irresponsible rebel. How could we share our conflicting ideals even for the sake of a peace each of us needed, but for which neither of us was prepared to pay the price?

The curious part of our perpetual tug of war was that my father never, and my mother very seldom, alluded to our continuous conflict.

My father's silence was perhaps due to an old-fashioned sense of sentimental loyalty that prevented his discussing his eldest child with a younger one. He was sometimes very angry with Wilmett, but he loved her with an unchanging pride and gratitude till she was taken from him.

My mother's attitude was less free from blame because she understood what Wilmett was doing to me and deeply regretted it. She and I were so intimate and outspoken with each other that I could and did remonstrate with her at my treatment; but while she admitted my wrongs, she urged me not to ask either help or support from her. Wilmett, she explained, did so much for her that she simply could not intervene to save me from these outbursts of temper and criticism without appearing ungrateful and risking the loss of that support which she so greatly needed. I accepted this plea as exonerating my mother from all activity on my behalf, but I hardly respected her for making it. There was, I felt, such a thing as human justice; and both my father and mother refused, where Wilmett was concerned, to execute it.

A little common-sense reasoning, and some firmness, on their part might have helped us both and made the whole family atmosphere a much less sultry one. My mother lacked courage to deal fundamentally with her children's problems, and my father's mind and heart were too absorbed by the increasing weight of his own. The child who suffered most at their hands was the one who tried her hardest to help them; the worst victim of poor Wilmett's unfettered generosity was herself.

Both my father and my mother were far beyond their age in their educational theories. But when it came to putting their enlightened theories into action, they bogged down before the heaviness of fact.

The only member of our family to receive a normal education was my brother George. He was the only one whose physical and social needs were seriously considered. From his school days on, his pocket money and

Ask Any Woman

BY MARCELENE COX

IN answer to the minister's question, "Who giveth this woman to be married to this man?" a father recently thrilled the wedding guests with, "Her mother and I."

Home should be the place where a person can occasionally live on the credit that a full knowledge of his character has built up.

A teen-ager out of sight is like a kite in the clouds; even though you can't see it you feel the tug on the string.

Too often the eternal triangle becomes the eternal wreck-tangle.

Lament from adolescent daughter: "The clerks are always showing me clothes to bring out my figure when what I want is something to bring it in."

She's the kind of wife who reminds her husband before he has time to forget.

It takes more courage than some women possess to start out on a vacation with a family of children and leave a washing machine behind.

No matter how gay your spirit, your child is always able to match it.

Words of advice should be inserted into discipline like grace notes in music.

When it comes to food, my husband is vitally interested in two things: that he's going to eat and that he has eaten.

It pays to be a kitchen lender; most women pay sugar back for salt, big eggs for small, and heaping cups for level ones.

No matter how fast they run, a dog never gets rid of his fleas nor a woman her shoulder pads.

No wonder bird housekeeping goes along so peaceably: penthouse orioles never mate with reed-nesting blue jays.

Some couples want only the sugared top of the marriage loaf.

A man's wife and children should have the good taste never to interrupt his reading of the evening paper; it should be surrounded with some of the reverence of a Sunday sermon.

Memo to brides: Whatever your husband doesn't see you put on or take off he believes is real.

The development of modern roses without thorns gives the proverb makers a new field.

Theirs was the kind of family that would always have a home even though they might not have a house to hold it.

financial allowances were, as far as my parents could afford it, ample; whereas the three of us had microscopic dress allowances, and our social opportunities were never taken into account at all. "Please, God, make us stylish. Our clothes are all wrong," my sister Wilmett was heard praying at her bedside in the early stages of our American life. There is no doubt that God consented to the prayer of one who always helped herself, for Wilmett, with the aid of the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, soon began to make her own clothes, and rapidly became stylish.

But I don't think, at the time, any of us in the least resented George's unconscious supremacy. He was our baby and we entered wholeheartedly into our parents' conspiracy to spoil him. We contented ourselves, as girls, with having a great deal more freedom of act and tongue than our contemporaries.

We knew that we were expected to earn our livings, but it did not occur to any of us that we were not being trained to carry out this purpose. Wilmett had a beautiful singing voice. Music was, therefore, considered to be her special province, and something or other, though seldom the best thing, was usually done to help her develop her gift.

Mary was a good scholar and had a particular aptitude for teaching; but nothing was ever done to help her carry out her wishes.

I was too young for my tastes to act as guides to my education, but it was obvious that I had an overwhelming interest in books, and it was supposed that I might develop, if left to myself, some connection with literature.

During Mary's second year at the Garden City school she had a severe attack of rheumatic fever, and this seemed a sufficient reason for recalling both sisters to their home. For a time they joined George and me at Miss King's Select Academy, which had a kindergarten where George could disport himself. Unfortunately, this school came to an abrupt end.

The close of Miss King's school threw us back into the unprepared bosom of our family. Wilmett decided not to attend school any further. Mary, George and myself were sent daily to an uneducated, neurotic and wholly incapable lady, who wanted to earn her living and thought that imparting what she didn't know was the easiest method of earning it. I remember only one outstanding fight with Wilmett during this period. She had made up her mind that, as she had retired from school, her authority over me must be publicly acknowledged. She was, so she told me, now grown up. To me she was exactly the same. "Very well," Wilmett said, "if you won't obey me, you must be made to," and she undertook to persuade my mother of the necessity for this operation. I think Wilmett must have found my mother much more difficult to persuade than usual. She stopped me on the middle of the stairs and, in an embarrassed voice, asked me to "try to do more often what Wilmett tells you."

My heart turned to stone. "Mother," I said desperately, "I'll do anything in the world you tell me except obey Wilmett. If you make me do that—I shall die."

In a sense, I still believe this would have been true and that something vital to my future would have perished under this new form of dictatorship. At any rate, I convinced my mother that she had asked too much. "Very well," she said quietly, "I won't ask you to obey Wilmett, but to come to me whenever she tells you what to do and to decide with me whether it is best to do it or not." This was not a complete victory, but neither was it a complete defeat. Orders continued to come from Wilmett, but they were not the Ten Commandments. I had an alternative to carrying them out and Wilmett knew that I had this alternative.

Just before my eleventh birthday it was decided that the family should spend the summer in England. Grandpapa Bottome decided that he had saved enough to accompany us. He would go his own way and visit the haunts of his youth; and my Grandmother Fowler, with a house full of servants and an enormous garden, would ensure our financial security.

I do not remember our actual arrival at Moor Hall, but what happened the next morning is as ineffaceable as if it took place yesterday.

Mary, with a face full of portentous gravity, led me to the water closet, a haunt favored by us both for confidential communications. Locking the door, she said, "Phyllis, dear grandpapa has joined the great majority!" The words may have been more or less unintelligible to me, but I knew instantly what she meant. Grandpapa, my friend, my protector, had ceased to exist. Nothing seemed real any more. I hardly took in what Mary went on to tell me. His oldest friend had met him as arranged at Tavistock in a high dog-cart. Driving down the steep hill that led to his home, the horse stumbled, grandpapa fell head forward onto the stony road and never recovered consciousness.

The whole day was catastrophic. I met my father weeping on the stairs while my mother tried to comfort him. I had never dreamed that a grown man could cry—least of all my father. A few hours later he and my mother disappeared with luggage into the bleak unknown that had swallowed grandpapa.

While our parents were away at Tavistock, Wilmett was extraordinarily kind to me. Under her careful shepherding I felt untroubled by commands or reproaches and free to deal as best I could with my first experience of death.

All summer long, however, I was troubled not only by the sense that grandpapa would never come back but by the feeling that he was quite definitely somewhere else, was indeed, if I could only get through to him, within my reach, behind some obstacle of sound and sense which I might, if left sufficiently alone and at peace, overcome.

I suppose that I was nearer a mental breakdown than at any other time of my life. I am sure that at home this unnatural condition would have passed off in a few days, but I was not at home. I was in a strange and, to me, most hostile atmosphere of Victorian formality. I was forced, at an age when I had been the free and happy companion of grown-up uncles, back into the nursery, where I had to be superintended by strange and ignorant women.

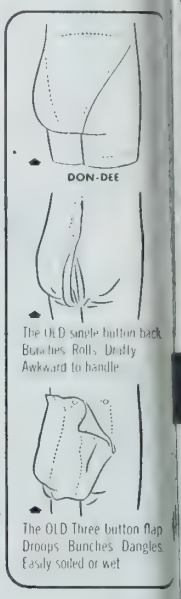
Day after day, week after week, it rained. I don't know what would have happened to me had it not been for the kind act of my step-uncle, Kennie Fowler, a man who subsequently became one of my greatest friends. Uncle Kennie found out that I was fond of reading and made me free of the use of a library. There I found and read the novels of George Meredith and, inadvertently, to Uncle George's extreme horror when it was discovered that I had read it, Hardy's Tess of the D'Urbervilles.

But these books, though I burrowed slowly and securely into them, meant nothing to me compared with my great discovery. I found Shelley. Shelley set fire to my summer. He lit my heart from end to end. All readers have one poet who, apart from his immortal ideas, has for them some special individual message. To me, in my eleventh year, Shelley was and remained my poet.

There is only one way of really enjoying poetry, and Uncle George had set me on its path. It should be learned by heart and, preferably, I thought at the time, sung aloud on the tops of trees. This became my habit. Moor Hall was full of trees, fortunately most of them chestnuts, an excellent tree to climb and possessing the best kind of leaves for concealment.

Among the poems I learned this summer and shared with the winds, was Shelley's Ode to Liberty and Ode to the West Wind, Skylark, Cloud, Hymn to Intellectual Beauty and the Lines Written in Dejection Near Naples. As for "Swiftly, walk over the Western Seas, Spirit of Night"—I sang it to myself all day long.

OUR homecoming was inevitably a sad one. A row of young uncles, faces set in unfamiliar gravity, awaited us on the wharf and we were driven at once to grandmother's. There she stood, in a room full of flowers, dressed in snowy white from head to foot.



In any room into which she came, my grandmother drew all eyes. She was an erect, squarely built woman, crowned with a mass of snow-white hair above firm black brows and immense dark eyes.

I think she deeply felt the loss of her lifelong partner; but for grandpapa, I am sure, the greater tragedy would have been for him to return. For the last twenty years of his life, my grandmother had become the leading figure in his household. He had not been unkindly deposed by her; his wishes and his words were always respected, but he was outside the picture of her great public life. Her presence was of such dynamic significance that it was impossible to overlook it; with all four sons their mother's work came first; and any statement or stricture of my grandfather's was often unheard or pushed aside.

ELDER MANUFACTURING CO. • ST. LOUIS, MO.

Nothing but the fact that both my grandparents had framed their lives on the Gospels could have made the situation run as smoothly as it did. Now it was over and my grandfather lay at rest in the small green island of his forefathers, while my grandmother pursued her larger way, lonely but unhindered.

Probably the two who missed him most were his homesick daughter-in-law and the youngest of his granddaughters.

A tremendous change was now in front of me. I was to go to boarding school in New York City.

My mother, having visited the Clewer Sisters while in England, had been deeply interested to hear of a boarding school run by a branch sisterhood of St. John the Baptist in 17th Street. The thought that I could be educated by the Anglican nuns and brought up in a High Church atmosphere no doubt greatly influenced my mother's willingness to part with me. I don't know that she exactly wanted me to become a nun; but if I had done so, I know she would have gloried—and shared—in my vocation.

I think that between eleven and twelve years of age is a very good time in a girl's life for her to leave her home. I know that until I went to boarding school, I was without a sense of separate personality.

My acute homesickness was soon dissolved by the interest and curiosity which I took in the new world round me. Never before had I stood alone on the threshold of a society of contemporaries. The sisters were aloof and austere, and their very gentleness had an awing quality. They were severe without being angry; and any plane they put one on seemed very much lower than their own.

What this country needs is a good five-cent nickel. —ED WYNN.

What was really astonishing to me and so pleasant that it lit my whole school career was the discovery that I could hold my own among my school companions. Pursued always by a deep sense of inferiority, it was highly agreeable to me to win any evidence of social success. I liked and was liked by all the girls of my own age, with one exception, and I reached an even higher pinnacle than this—the elder girls soon showed a pleasant and kindly interest in me.

My home life never became less dear to me; but it had receded. The only member of my family who became more real was my father. He came to see me quite often. I had never seen him alone before, and he became extremely dear to me. The moment I heard his deep voice I trembled with joy, and as soon as permission came danced down the main staircase to the Visitors' Room, and into his arms.

Out we slipped, arm in arm, from the cloistered school into the noisy life of the New York streets, and for an hour or two I would hear and share our family records: the extraordinary news, for instance, that my sister Wilmett was to go for a year to stay with my English grandmother. She was to winter in Egypt, and then was to "come out."

I don't even now know quite whose was this tremendous decision, but Uncle Frank had been disturbed for some time over the amount of work Wilmett at seventeen performed, and the condition of her nerves. I think Uncle Frank believed that as long as Wilmett remained actively nursing my mother there was no chance of her recovery. An opportune letter from my Grandmother Fowler arrived, inviting Wilmett to be her visitor, expense free. Mother loved Wilmett far too well to stand in her light, and though Wilmett at first rebelled, she finally succumbed to the temptation. It was found by a London specialist who saw her on her arrival that Wilmett was on the verge of what used to be called a "decline." In modern language, she was threatened with tuberculosis, and though with plenty of milk, rest and freedom from care, she seemed quickly to pick up her old strength and vitality, the threat remained.

It was difficult to think of our home without Wilmett, for she was the pivot upon which everything turned; but Mary, undertaking her chief responsibilities, became a faithful drudge, and I fancy peace of a precarious but not unpleasant kind settled upon the Jamaica household.

THE last few months of my school life at St. John the Baptist's were overshadowed by my first great friendship.

Claude was unknown to my family. I had chosen her by myself, and round her I persistently wove all the romance of my being. Claude came from the South, and some months earlier had been sent for, to go to her mother's deathbed. Sister A., whose special protégée she was, told us Claude had been very ill, and asked us, on her return, to show her every sign of sympathy. We must all pray for her.

I never expected to be able to do more than pray for Claude, since I was one of the youngest and she one of the oldest girls, but I asked questions about her and was told that she was very much liked, and yet, by being a Southerner, somehow "different" from the rest of the school.

Sister A. brought her back one winter afternoon, almost lost in black, very small and exquisitely made, pale with a thick creamy skin, like a heavy-petaled flower. Her hair was black and so were her eyes. They looked very large and bright, filled with unshed tears. Claude was not pretty, but she was just as sad as I had pictured her.

All the girls in the school were sorry for Claude, but I think none of them was so sorry—so almost wrapped up in her sorrow—as I was. Perhaps Claude felt this, too; perhaps being a Southerner among Northerners made her feel a special sympathy for an exiled English child; but for whatever reason, Claude stooped from the Olympian heights of her natural circle to my twelve-year-old insignificance, and made me her greatest friend.

We had few opportunities to develop our deep affection, for if there was one thing the sisters were more determined to suppress than any other, it was a special friendship; and if there was one kind of special friendship that they viewed with more dismay than another, it was any friendship between an older and a younger girl.

Claude was reckless by nature, and I was reckless by devotion, so that we broke every rule that stood between us—surprisingly enough, without being discovered. We had one great advantage: Claude among the older girls, and I among the younger ones, were declared by secret ballot to be the two most popular girls in the school. We were therefore gladly given a good deal of undue support. Other girls watched doors for us, or signaled advancing danger, down passages.

There was no particular object in our stolen meetings except that little by little I learned the whole marvelous history of Claude's precocious Southern life. It was thrilling to learn that Claude at sixteen was passionately pursued by dozens of suitors. She was even engaged to be married to four different Wills simultaneously, none of them knowing of this tie between Claude and the others.

I did vaguely wonder why Claude should be engaged to four men at the same time, as ultimately she could marry only one, but Claude explained that she loved them all for different reasons; and doubted that more than one would be eligible when it came to the point of marriage. Probably the one she loved the most never would be eligible, because he was wild and drank. This Will immediately became my favorite, and I spent a good deal of time in suggestions for his reform. All the Wills were very handsome, very dashing, and all were skilled horsemen. At her wedding Claude might have had at least three young Lochinvars riding in from the West.

Claude was far more to me than just another girl; she was the romantic and impassioned South. I used to escape from my music room, where I was supposed to be practicing, to find Claude and sit at her feet while all this new lore was poured into my ecstatic ears.

Then the blow fell. We were to go back to England—not for a visit, but for good.

My father broke it to me. The doctor had said my mother could not live if she remained any longer in this country.

My father resigned his living. He made no bones about it to me; he hated as I did this flight from his country. He did not realize the cause of my agony, because of course I never told him why it would break my heart to go, but I saw that it was breaking his. He said, "This is the end of my career, Phyllis, and it's like death." Yet my resistance was as hollow as his own. Mother's life was at stake and there was nothing to be done but go, cost what it might.

I thought of nothing but Claude. I took for granted that the parting between us was final. I left school next day, and it was the end of my education.

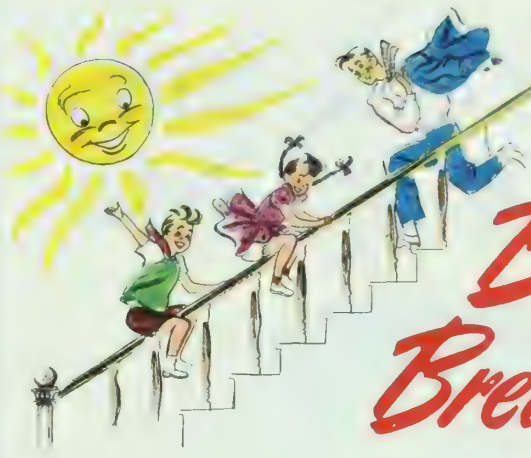
No doubt I dramatized the sheer horror of our return to England. The only pleasures I had were in the past and I spent all the time brooding over it.

Yet I am bound to admit that when we reached our London destination, the home of my grandmother in Grosvenor Square, I felt awed if not enchanted by my surroundings.

The center of all these grandeurs was Wilmett. She was nearly twenty and at the peak of her girlish beauty. Both my grandparents loved and admired her, and had set off her charms by lovely clothes. Wilmett had always had the poise and carriage of the courageous heart, and when she entered a room it was with a marvelous ease and dignity. I felt, for the first time, not only a mere child in her presence, but a humble and deeply admiring child.

The right temperature at home is maintained by warm hearts, not by hot heads.

It was my father's wish to spend the summer at Burnham-on-Sea in Somerset, a small and hideous seaside village. The golf was good and an old friend of his was spending the season there with his family. My mother was content to go where my father pleased for the moment.



I think it was about this time that golf became the supreme interest of my father's life. He had never been in any real sense a "domestic" man, nor companionable—though highly attractive—to any of his children. Now he became simply less and less companionable. It must be remembered that he was a bitterly disappointed, lonely and heart-hungry man.

His mother's love, her overwhelming generosity and courage had trained all her sons to expect too much help, rather than too little, from the women they loved. My father, in revenge for having so much less than he expected, did not take what there was. He became a stranger in his home.

Burnham-on-Sea had no advantages whatever for a child of my age. George was still young enough to enjoy the beach. Mary was at her former school in Bournemouth. Wilmett remained for the rest of the season in London.

I was just a few months younger than Juliet when romance claimed me. It was to me, not only my first, but a very serious love affair, though today it would hardly pass as a flirtation. No doubt I had been trained toward this premature experience by Claude's enchanting idyls.

Harry was twenty years old, a Sandhurst cadet, and every inch a soldier. My heart had been won by his mother before he put in an appearance. She was small, dark and in some ways reminded me of Claude. She lifted me to the seventh heaven by her notice; she even thought me "clever." We had some wonderful talks together about books. She loved her eldest son, Harry, better than anything else in the world. He was six feet one, blue-eyed and fair; and I thought his photograph—which I still possess (though I don't quite know where to lay my hands on it)—that of the handsomest man in the world. I felt sure he would fall in love with Wilmett.

They both came to Burnham at about the same time; and there was no question that Harry was attracted by her. Wilmett, though not the least in love with Harry (she was three deep in more serious beaus), felt it natural to collect Harry, and set to work to do so.

There was a good deal of trouble over an incident which occurred at a dance (to which, of course, I was too young to go). Harry kissed Wilmett, she declared against her will; and Harry fell into deep disgrace. I was entirely on Wilmett's side, and looked upon Harry's performance as little less than criminal.

The first opportunity that occurred I told him that I considered he had behaved abominably. To my astonishment, he apologized with deep humility. It was I, he told me, not Wilmett, who was the object of all his thoughts and feelings. It was true he had kissed Wilmett, but only because he thought she had expected it. Wilmett, I knew, took a lighter view of flirtation than I did. For my sake, however, Harry promised he would apologize to Wilmett. He apologized and was promptly forgiven; but what was less forgivable, unfortunately, was the fact that soon Harry transferred his attention to me.

Intolerance in old age is more often an indication of poor memory than mature wisdom.

—H. L. HUNTINGTON, JR., Pattering Reigns (Flyer Press).

We were simply ardently attracted friends. We talked and walked together for the next few weeks, unfolding all our thoughts and claims upon the universe.

As Harry was going to India for five years, where he might find no woman to look after his wardrobe, he had learned to darn; and he used to darn my stockings for me with consummate care while I read Henry James out loud to him, sitting in a small windless cemetery behind the sand dunes. We did not make a secret of our meetings, but neither did we make a point of talking about them to our families. We were free to come and go as we pleased; and the cemetery was where—as often as we dared—we went.

At first our two families were mildly amused by our friendship. But later on both families became alarmed by the increasing seriousness of our infatuation, and interferences began. My mother was extremely careful of my feelings, but she told me that I was too young to carry on such a friendship with a young man of Harry's age; had he been my own age, it wouldn't have mattered. The agonizing part of the whole affair was that the chief objection to our friendship came from Harry's mother. At first she had enjoyed seeing us together, but now she suddenly became furious—furious with me, of course, not with Harry. If she had not been blinded by jealousy, she would have seen that I still loved her best—better even than Harry—and that a kind and unde standing talk from her would have dispose of the whole affair. A wiser woman woul have seen that neither my heart nor my u awakened senses were involved—only fo the first time my power sense had been se free. I found I could do what I liked wit another human being.

We had to part. Harry had to return t Sandhurst and then to sail to India, but no before I had promised to await his return, an not to go into a sisterhood, with which I ha threatened him, till he was free to ask m hand in marriage.

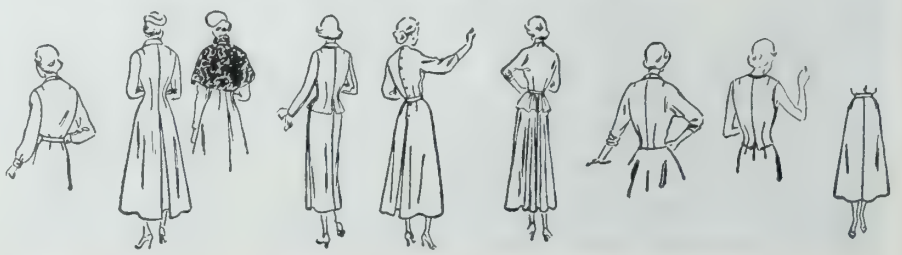
The night before he left, his mother re lented a little. She played his accompani ments and Harry sang Beauty's Eyes fo the last time. I knew it was for me alone though our combined families were present.

I am glad to think that he fulfilled the career we had so often talked of and eventually became a general. We never met again, except for a few fluttered, disenchanting moments, under vigilant eyes, when Harry came back on his first leave from India.

Perhaps I should never have become a writer if I had married Harry; or Harry a general had he married me; but even without any such sequel to our first love affair, we must have done something for each other's imaginations in those few weeks of perpetual conversation.

Blown out of Burnham by harsh October gales, we decided to spend the winter in London, where Wilmett could continue her singing lessons. My father had accepted the care of St. Luke's, Camberwell, while its rector went abroad for the winter.

My life was incredibly empty. I wrote tremendous letters to Mary. I never got Harry out of my mind, though he became less and less like Harry and more and more like a peculiar blend of my favorite heroes—Cardinal Newman, Robert Louis Stevenson and Shelley.



Restored to each other after their long parting, Wilmett and my mother closed together into an intimacy of heart and mind which shut out the rest of the world. Father and I were nearly always in trouble, and as much as possible outside the house.

Wilmett's impatience with us both was more obvious, and her flashes of temper became more and more frequent. Perhaps she missed the ease and opulence of her years in Grosvenor Square. Wilmett had her singing lessons and practiced for three hours daily. She possessed a beautiful mezzo-soprano voice which her teacher assured her was powerful enough for grand opera. Her heart was more or less engaged by a young officer she had met in Egypt and from whom she had been separated before any actual engagement took place, partly by grandma and partly by Lord Kitchener's edict that none of his officers in the Egyptian army should marry.

first time since I left the United States I found a purpose and flung myself wholeheartedly into it.

There was a successful American elocution teacher in London. Miss Fanny Mason accepted me as a pupil and I joined her class. Now I had really found what I wanted to do and knew that I could learn how to do it. I became one of her most promising pupils, and soon acquired twenty-five different programs, each lasting two hours, in which I was word-perfect. I learned to recite both prose and poetry, but curiously enough, from my point of view, Miss Mason decided that my special gift was that of a comedian.

It was this winter that Gerard Coleridge, my partner in age, became for the next few years my most intimate and indeed my only contemporary friend. It was a curious relationship; intellectually we became increasingly intimate and acted as grindstones for each other's expanding minds, but there was always between us a curious gulf of untouched emotion which neither ever crossed. Gerard was an extraordinarily good fellow, "a man's man" rather than a woman's. He had a slow, powerful brain, an extremely hot, flash-in-the-pan temper, and was, though a decent and high-minded human being, extremely self-centered. From the time we were fifteen and sixteen (he was a year older than myself) till we were twenty and twenty-one, we spent part of all his holidays together.

We became engaged simultaneously, without hint or preparation, in different countries to people the other had never met or even heard about, and the only shadow on our engagements was the fear that the other might resent it. Neither of us did, but curiously, without a word of explanation to each other, we withdrew from our five years' fellowship.

I think we both realized that wholly without sentiment as our relationship had been, it had nevertheless gone too deep into the habit of mental sharing to be bearable our chosen life partners. We met only ha dozen times afterward, over more tha quarter of a century, but when we did m it was as if we had never parted. Whe heard of his death a few months ago, half youth rose up and joined him. When son one asked him if he was never in love w me, he said, "I couldn't be in love w Phyllis. She was immaculate; but she w my dearest friend." I think he made mistake in the word "immaculate." I w ignorant and afraid of sex, not "imm ulate"; but probably it was this deep u conscious fear in me which froze in him a possibility of a deeper feeling. To our lo and vital friendship our fairy godmothe gave every gift in friendship's repertoi except a touch of passion.

The threat that had been hanging over m physically for the last few years now too effect. I had to have a fairly serious opera tion. I was extremely happy in the nursin home. It was almost disappointing to be we enough to go back into our rather gloom lodgings, especially as George, whose Easte holidays it was, had been consigned to ou uncle's with Wilmett. However, neithe George nor I was to make much of thes holidays. A fellow lodger, who was recover ing from a successfully concealed and virulen type of measles, asked to be allowed to rest in our sitting room where George and I were playing together. We both took the infectio and I, weakened no doubt by my operation had pneumonia and very nearly died of it

Mary nursed me with unrelaxing zeal and kindness, night and day. I am sure that what kept me alive was the presence of Mary and the book, an interminable romantic one, called Janice Meredith, which she read aloud to me. Still, I think it was a pity that our beloved physician should have chosen this particular moment to warn me that the career I had planned on the stage could never, with my now weakened lungs, take place.

The ORIGINAL

My teacher, Fanny Mason, had removed the last real barrier between me and the stage by offering to finance me for the first two years, either on the stage or as a public elocutionist. Also, to my intense joy and pride, Pennell, who had heard me give a recital, offered me a job in Charlie's Aunt at the peak of its run, on a tour of the provinces, and at the princely sum of three pounds a week. At seventeen I felt there was really no time at all to lose, and now my future had become unmanageably taken out of my mother hands.

My father had from time to time been offered several small, damp, obscure country livings which he had hitherto refused. Suddenly a new project was laid before him. Would he take charge for nine months of the parish of Swanscombe in Kent—a part of basic slum in the country, inhabited almost exclusively by cement workers? If he would, and if another living could be found in the interval for its present vicar, now suffering from a nervous breakdown, my father would be offered Swanscombe as a permanence.

There was very little to be said for Swanscombe. It was inundated with smoke from twenty-two chimneys. The place, however, was dry, the stipend adequate.

Spring rushed into summer and our first visit to Swanscombe was both happy and successful. My father hurled himself with great zest and energy into this new opportunity. He visited for hours every day, and the people took to him and he to the people. My mother enjoyed the complete absence of any social life. Wilmett was only to spend the holidays with us, as she had found a lodging in West Kensington, which suited her for her singing.

Mary and I became the most ardent of curates. We each took over a district to visit. Mary decided that girls should be her field, and boys were to be mine. She started a girls' Bible class and a girls' club, while I started a Band of Hope and a club for boys between the ages of thirteen and eighteen. Mary and I liked the people and they seemed to like us. Ostensibly we called only to take them the magazine, which cost a penny, and we weren't supposed to leave the magazine unless we got the penny, but we often did, and made it up out of our pocket money. We were always asked in, and just sat down and talked about the children and their troubles. It would have been ridiculous for us at twenty and sixteen to offer advice, and I don't think either of us ever did. We hadn't any money and they knew we hadn't. But they had troubles and they had children and they liked talking about them. I think it was in the early autumn of our first winter at Swanscombe that a young American friend of my father, George Edward Barton, whom we used to call G.E.B., came to visit us. He was a Boston architect who had come on to England to meet Henry James. With awe and delight this great meeting had taken place, just before his visit to us, and his description of it fired my blood. What courage, what brilliance, I felt, must be at work in his mind—to fit him for so magnificent an ordeal!

Artful dressing and a smooth paint job will take twenty years off her true age. But you can't fool a long flight of stairs.

For hours, sitting on a footstool by my father's side, I used to listen to the talk between him and G.E.B. I could not join in it. I did not know enough. The world they talked of—countries, books and men—circled above my head.

In silence I built up a relationship with G.E.B., which was entirely one of dreams. It did not surprise me that G.E.B. far preferred Wilmett. He was twenty-seven, and though I had my hair up, I was only sixteen. He was never to know how greatly a chance remark of his influenced my whole future life. I told him that I had wanted to be an actress but had had to give it up. "Don't you think," he said, "it would be more fun to write your own ideas instead of merely to act those of other people?"

I instantly began to write a book which was entitled The Sorrows of the World, but I must admit that I never finished it. There were too many sorrows, and I had the grace to realize that I might not yet know everything that was necessary to know about them all. But the schooling in words that this exercise involved prepared me for the novel I was to begin—and finish—a few months later.

When our family doctor first saw the little lumps that had risen on Wilmett's neck after a slight, but curiously prolonged, attack of influenza, I was struck by his look of shocked horror, instantly overlaid by excessive cheerfulness. "This won't do, you know," he boomed in his friendly voice. "You'll have to go to the seaside at once, and get rid of these." There was nothing sinister in this suggestion, and the financial obstacles disappeared when Grandma Fowler swooped down upon us in a carriage and carried Wilmett off to Eastbourne.

My father had been offered and had accepted a locum tenens in the delightful village of Betchworth, Surrey, for six months. Never before had we—by the mere fluke of circumstance—inhabited a handsome, well-furnished home set in a garden that was the pride and joy of the best gardener in a neighborhood that specialized in gardens. Never before, and never again, were we three girls—against our own family background—to taste a normal social life.

The parish suddenly found themselves listening to a preacher who set them smiling, weeping and trembling by turns. They had never seen a beauty who sang as Wilmett sang, or a strange creature, half child, half woman, who recited like a professional; and last but by no means least, never had they seen a boy of thirteen who was so fine a cricketer as George.

Mary, if not so spectacular a personality at first sight, produced incredible talents for charming children. She told self-made fairy tales that held the little Betchworth boys and girls spellbound.

My mother, of course, instantly made it plain that she would refuse all social opportunities. But invitations poured in just the same. Wilmett, Mary and I, taking it in turns to accompany my father, were invited out to dinner five nights out of the seven. My father held dinner tables enthralled, and we made the evenings' entertainment afterward. I don't think we were ever jealous of one another. I thought Wilmett one of the world's finest singers, and Wilmett accepted with surprise—but she did accept—the curious wish the Betchworth people had to hear me recite.

Wilmett could play a little vague tennis and even golf—but not of a kind that came anywhere near the Betchworth standard. None of us played hockey, and this seemed the most indelible stain on our characters.

A very kind lady, the mother of a large and handsome family of young people, told me sternly one afternoon, "My dear child, I think it my duty to tell you that you and your sisters will never get on in England unless you learn to play games!" Her words sank deep into my heart.

I didn't know quite what to do about it. I couldn't play tennis by myself—nobody had time to teach me golf; although I did nothing about the games, I promptly sat down and wrote a book—a whole book. It was my first completed novel, and I called it Life, the Interpreter. All that I can say for it as a novel is that it had a beginning, a middle and an end, and a definite amount of story. I read it to nobody, and concealed the whole process, as far as possible. Almost more happened at Betchworth than ever happened in any one summer of my life.

Mary was about to set off to America, to spend a year with grandma and Uncle George. Grandma and Uncle George and Harry were all visiting us this summer, and there was an unusual amount of excitement

There was a shadow, too, hanging over us. Wilmett had returned from Eastbourne looking more blooming than ever, but the lumps on her neck had not altogether disappeared, and might, our doctor told us, have to be operated on.

In the early part of the summer, before the arrival of the American relatives, Wilmett began her last and most thorough romance. This young man was a friend of my Uncle Harry's, and had visited us several times in London. Now he spent several week ends with us. From the first Arthur's attraction to Wilmett was as plain as hers to him, so that we all began to take a happy issue for granted.

It was an incredible summer; day followed golden day without a break. No day was ever long enough for me. I often got up at five to pick and arrange the flowers with which I filled the house. Marvels of fruit and vegetables poured in on us from the garden. We ate better than my mother's incredible parsimony had ever allowed us to eat before, or would allow us to eat afterward.

The American relatives arrived, grandma and I went up to London for a few days together, to visit Grandma Fowler, at the height of the season in Grosvenor Square; and Grandma Bottome extracted my first evening dress from my English grandmother.

At first it threatened to be a very dull and disappointing affair. Grandma offered me a gray taffeta silk skirt of her own; and a piece of emerald satin, of which to make a bodice. Peckham, her maid, who was an excellent dressmaker, sniffed at it privately. "I shall never be able to make anything of that, Miss Phyllis," she told me. But Grannie Bottome put an end to the catastrophe. "Rachel," she said, "give the child what she wants! This is her first evening dress! Let her choose it, and let it be new! You're far too generous to want to limit the child's pleasure!" And my Grandmother Fowler, who I think had never been accused of generosity before, promptly succumbed.

I went out free and untrammeled, and we bought yards and yards of daffodil-yellow satin and white chenille to trim it.

Four years later—for in my youth an evening dress had to last for a long time—I was to meet my future husband in this dress; and I have always thought that the daffodil satin decided his choice.

This long and perfect summer ended on a note of doubt. Mary went a little unwillingly forth on her great adventure. Wilmett was to have the operation on her glands, after all, and it did not sound as light a one as we had hoped. Arthur had not yet proposed to her. The first thing to be done, after George had gone back to school and Mary been seen off to America, was for Wilmett to see the surgeon.

Arthur Sheilds, I believe one of the first surgeons of the day, was chosen. Father flatly refused to go near him. He could not bear the thought of Wilmett's illness and feared, I think, that he might break down under an adverse verdict. Mother promised to go, but on the day of the appointment remained in bed with a headache; so I went with Wilmett. Wilmett looked very young and beautiful, and in triumphant health; it was the last time she was to go out into the world without her arm in a sling. She was nervous and disappointed that mother was not with her, but she was very sweet about my going. I doubt if it seemed natural to the eminent surgeon, or to our own family doctor, when they found no one but a child of seventeen to whom to impart their verdict. They imparted it, however, without knowing it, for after Sheilds had examined Wilmett, he deliberately sat down as if he were tired, and said over his shoulder to our friend, "So that's that." A moment later he was cheerfully explaining to Wilmett that she must have a little surgical treatment, "to get rid of these glands."

"Do you mean an operation?" Wilmett asked.

"Well—yes," Mr. Sheilds admitted, "I do mean an operation."

"Will it be dangerous?" Wilmett demanded.

"All operations can be dangerous," Mr. Sheilds answered evasively. "You have youth—good organs—everything necessary to see you through."

"And what would happen if I didn't have the operation?" Wilmett asked.

"You can't not have it," Mr. Sheilds said severely.

"You mean I'd die if I didn't?" Wilmett persisted.

"We don't need to think about that," our own doctor boomed reassuringly. "Of course you'll have it—and of course it will go splendidly!"

But Wilmett never took her eyes off Mr. Sheilds. She asked quietly, "Exactly what is the matter with me? Is it really my glands—or is it cancer?"

THERE was the longest possible pause before Arthur Sheilds said grimly but not unkindly, "Aren't bad glands bad enough for you, Miss Bottome?"

"Glands! Glands, of course!" boomed our pleasant old family friend as if he were finding a particular relish in repeating the name of Wilmett's terrifying vicissitude.

"Are they tubercular?" Wilmett went on inexorably, for she knew quite a lot about illness.

"That we can't decide before we've opened them up," Mr. Sheilds told her a little impatiently.

"Either they're tubercular or it is cancer!" I told myself, when he had finished; and I greatly feared that Wilmett would have come to the same conclusion. But the answer to Wilmett's last question, "Would the operation disfigure her much?" reassured her so much that I think the answer to the earlier one slipped her vigilance. Both doctors promised that the trouble was too low down for any scar to show.

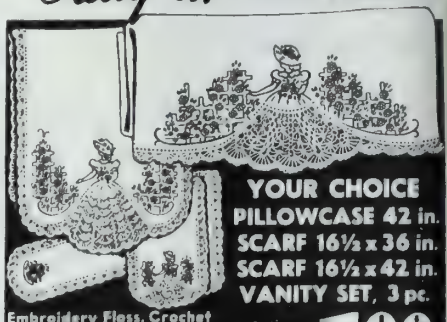
Her beautiful throat was untouched by the swelling. I myself could see that the lump went down from just above the breast under her right arm.

Wilmett underwent the operation a week later, and got through it with unruffled courage. She showed me with great pride a tiny line left with flowers from Arthur, "Keep a stiff upper lip—love—Arthur." "I think it means more," she said, "than if he wrote quite a lot, don't you?" We knew only after Wilmett's death that Arthur had seen Mr. Sheilds after the operation to ask if marriage was possible and had been told that her case was hopeless.

The nursing home she was in was quite a distance from our lodgings, but I went to visit her every day for the three weeks she was there.

My mother was quite ill all this winter with neuralgia, and other troubles, and my father had to spend a great deal of his time at Swanscombe.

I was so busy that I quite forgot my ms. of Life, the Interpreter till one day I saw an advertisement in a literary paper from an agent called Watts. I sent him my typed ms. and asked him to let me know if he thought the book suitable for publication. Ten days later I got a letter asking me to call at the office.



I told no one of this adventure, but went by myself and after some difficulty found my way to his handsome office. Mr. Watts was an immense, stout man with a magnificent head of golden curls. He looked rather like a somnolent but kindhearted lion.

He told me he had read my ms. and would be willing to try to place it. All I had to do was to pay a preliminary fee of three guineas, and give him ten per cent of any profits the book might bring in. As it was a first book, that would probably be small.

The only trouble about this breath-taking prospect was that I hadn't got the three guineas. Mr. Watts, with incredible generosity, told me that on account of my youth he would waive the preliminary fee; and I went out of his office as if I were traveling on air.

But the book and its uncertain future were soon sunk in fresh and extreme anxiety about Wilmett. One day I found her with a lot of color and talking rather excitedly about a possible visit from Arthur Sheilds. Our own doctor came in, and asked me to go into the sitting room with him for a few moments.

"Look here," he said unhappily, "I want you to help me about your sister. I ought not to ask you, I know—you're much too young! But I have to speak to somebody—I cannot take the whole responsibility! Your sister has a bad turn and I've asked Sheilds to call. He may be able to drain the poison from the wound—in which case she'll get over it—but if the poison doesn't drain off—well—she won't get over it! Ought I to tell your parents until we know which way it is going? I'd much rather your mother didn't know."

"Will she be conscious and want to see them?" I asked.

"No, I don't think so," he said; "anyhow, on no account must she realize there is any danger!"

"All right then," I said, "let's wait and see!"

The relief in his eyes was unmistakable. "I think that is best myself," he told me. "Now go back to your sister, and don't let her have any idea that anything is in the wind. Tell her Sheilds' visit is just a routine affair."

I was glad my father was away, because I doubted if I could have kept the truth from him. He would have wanted too much to know exactly how Wilmett was; but I had no inclination to give way before my mother.

You need to be quite a juggler if you have a reputation to keep up and a reputation to live down.
—ALAN BLAIR: More Bright Brevities (F. Muller, Ltd.).

I didn't want to upset her, and also, I think I knew, she did not want to be upset.

At last, late in the afternoon of a black November day, I heard the familiar clop, clop of our doctor's brougham check outside our door. In a second I was down the stairs. "It's all right!" he told me cheerfully. "Her temperature's dropped. She'll get over this now."

Wilmett was to go to Broadstairs as soon as she was fit to travel. She went off buoyantly; father and I, calling for her in state in grandma's carriage at the little nursing home, swept her off to the station. Nurse Hilton went with her for a week to help settle her down, but Wilmett did not look like an invalid any more; she had set her face toward life. Mr. Sheilds had told her she could soon start singing again, though of course she could not play the piano yet, as she must keep her arm in a sling for a few weeks. Arthur was coming to Broadstairs to stay before his return to America. This time Wilmett was quite sure that Arthur meant to propose to her; and all her courage and her fortitude reinforced her expectation.

Only one incident marred her complete happiness. Wilmett had set her heart on seeing mother before she left London. The doctor had not wanted her to add this fresh exertion to her journey; and father had strongly urged mother to go and see Wilmett instead. He was angrier than I had ever seen him when she refused. Our doctor, when father demanded if my mother couldn't safely drive to the nursing home, admitted that she could. Finally I added my persuasions to theirs. At last my mother said in desperation, "Tell Wilmett, I'll try to come and see her—if she insists." I gave the message, adding that our doctor was sure it would do her no harm. Wilmett was silent for a moment, then she said gently, "Give her my love, and tell her I don't insist."

I now think—and perhaps Wilmett knew this at the time—that it was not a failure of love on my mother's part so much as sheer panic pain. My mother was not only a pessimist but she knew more than the rest of us did about the onslaughts of tubercle. Like Hagar turning away from the thirst-stricken Ishmael in the desert, she was saying to herself, "Let me not see the death of the child!"

Both Wilmett and I idolized my mother. Our lives were filled to the brim with her opinions and illusions. Her prejudices became our principles; but as we were both a great deal more active than she was, we lost no opportunity of putting them into effect. It took me years to rid myself of her constant depreciation of my father; and Wilmett never quite got over it, though I think during her last illness she began to lean upon him, and look up to him in a new way. Now that I am older than my father was when he died, I can understand and appreciate him as I never did before, and without feeling the harsh resentment toward my mother which—after I was nineteen years old—was the reaction to my long slavery to her thoughts and wishes. I now believe, too, that my mother herself really possessed many of the virtues which she prided herself upon having; and that only fear prevented her from using them.

She had accepted my father's tremendously idealized version of her, when they were first in love, and she felt there was nothing more she need do about it. Nor did my father until his death really cease to idealize my mother, though he had bitter awakenings.

When I had seen Wilmett off, with her dreadful operation behind her, gay as I had not seen her for months, and as I was never to see her again, I willfully shut my eyes to her danger, and devoted myself to work. I set myself with vim to be the two curates my father needed in Mary's absence, while nursing my mother the rest of the time.

I was allowed to keep two dogs, who were my constant companions and acted as light relief to my strenuous existence. Our doctor had extracted from my parents before we left London a promise that I should have a daily walk, which we all greatly enjoyed—the mastiff John, Tommy the fox terrier, my father and myself. We talked endlessly and happily, planning our parish work.

ABOUT this time, a letter reached me from Andrew Lang, who was at this time reader for Longmans Green & Co. He had read Life, the Interpreter, he told me. Was he right in surmising that it was a first book? And would I mind telling him my age before he decided to advise Longmans to publish it? This last question perturbed me very much. Would he think seventeen too young to write a novel? Should I be guilty of dishonesty if I stretched the point to my present maturer age of eighteen? I stretched it; and to my great relief Andrew Lang wrote by return of post, that it was just my being so young that made the book worth publishing; thou how he could think me young at eight passed my comprehension; and indeed I ha never felt so old since.

I think this acceptance of my book ga my parents a ray of pleasure in their da winter. My mother read, and was enchant with, the proofs; my father, more wise critical, was satisfied with it as a beginnin

I had chosen, as was then the fashion, lin of poetry or immortal prose to head ea chapter; and I find that I now wholly agr with one of my critics who wrote that it w astonishing that anyone who could choos such exquisite literature to head her cha ters could write such abject prose.

I SUFFERED for the next ten years from complete absence of objective or seasone criticism, while I continued to produce nov els—whose fate in a more prolific age woul and should have been the wastepaper basket During this winter and spring, however, had not much time to write.

Three months after her operation, Wilmett was to come to us at Swanscombe for a couple of nights, in order to report to Arthur Sheilds in London.

We had heard that her arm was still in a sling and that there were some lumps showing, yet she appeared stronger and we did not at once notice any decided change for the worse in her. She was frightened, as we all were frightened, at these returning lumps, but what we immediately feared was a fresh operation.

As usual father refused to go to the consultation, and mother found a bad headache to keep her in bed. Wilmett cried when she saw that once more she had only me to fall back on. It must have seemed strange to her, when she had done so much for both my parents, that they could do so little for her.

This time she and Arthur Sheilds knew each other better. There was no beating about the bush. While he was examining her he said over his shoulder, to our observing old friend, "You can see for yourself!"

Wilmett asked quickly, "I needn't have another operation, need I?"

"No," Mr. Sheilds replied, "you needn't have another operation."

Wilmett looked radiantly happy for a moment, and then puzzled. "But will they go down by themselves," she asked, "when I go back to Broadstairs? It hasn't seemed to do me much good till now."

"You needn't go back to Broadstairs unless you want to!" Mr. Sheilds surprisingly replied. "Do whatever you like!"

"Of course I'm happiest at home," Wilmett said after a little pause, "but Mr.

Sheilds, last time I saw you, you said I must not go home—even for a night—because of the smoke! Why doesn't it matter any more?"

Mr. Sheilds opened his lips to speak and then closed them while our old friend hurriedly explained for him: this time of the year—May and June—perhaps the smoke wouldn't matter so much; later on in the summer she must return to Broadstairs for July and August. "Not the smoke and the heat together, that wouldn't do at all." He went on explaining and overexplaining; but I don't think either of us paid much attention to him—we were still listening to what Mr. Sheilds hadn't said. All the way home Wilmett quarreled with me for not agreeing with her that she was doomed; but I knew she was secretly relieved that I pretended not to believe it.

She stayed at home for the next few weeks. I began to see that there was a change in Wilmett, though it was hard to define exactly; for one thing, she didn't have a single temper while she was with us, and for another she did not seem so interested in family concerns. It was almost as if she were on a visit to us and not a part of our home. She spent a great deal of her time with mother, and got on almost perfectly well with my father and myself; but she seemed grave and preoccupied.

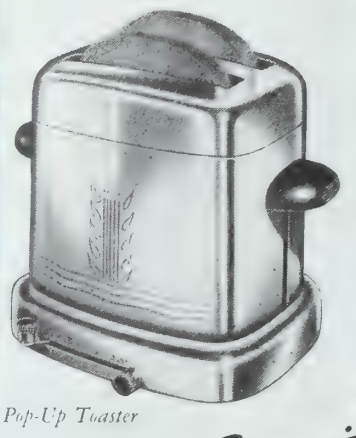
HER shoulder ached a great deal, but she complained very seldom. Once she called me into her bedroom and I found her with a small cardboard box beside her. "Phyllis," she said, "I want you to burn these for me—they're Arthur's letters. I can't manage to do it with one arm. He is married now, and I don't want to keep them any more." She looked at me with that queer grave look which was so unlike her, and said, "You see, I have no incentive to live now."

It is not possible to forgive myself for what followed. I let her go back to Broadstairs alone. No other idea had occurred to any of us at the moment; but it should have occurred to me. I was too happy in my new life too busy after years of empty loneliness t understand where my true duty lay.

Wilmett went back to Broadstairs at th end of June, and a few weeks later she wrot begging mother to visit her. Mother refused and Wilmett wrote again asking for me; an I, too, refused. My mother reproached m sharply, and appealed to my father to urg me to go. My father, with a queer look at her replied, "I don't understand either of you Daisy; but Wilmett asked first for you." My mother said no more. I knew they both wanted me to go, but who was to run their errands?

A FEW weeks later we had a telegram from Mrs. Courtney to say that she was bringing Wilmett home in two days' time, and that a letter would follow from Doctor Courtney. It was a frightened but guarded letter. Wilmett wanted to come home; she was less well and needed expert nursing.

Even then my poor mother wanted to stop Wilmett's coming, but this time she found both my father and myself fiercely against her. Too late, I would now have given my life to give Wilmett what she no longer wanted.



We tried to hide our shock when we saw her. Two months previously she had left us looking nearly her normal self; now she was so thin that when I helped her upstairs—for she was too weak to sit up for tea in the sitting room—I had nearly to carry her. "Now," she whispered to me, half laughing, half crying, "you're the big sister and I'm the little one!" She was coughing nearly all the time. "I shall come downstairs for Christmas," she told me, when I had got her safe in bed; but she never came downstairs again.

Nurse Hilton, her former nurse, whom she loved and who adored her, came and stayed with Wilmett till the end.

It took a long time for Wilmett to die. Mary came back from America a few weeks later. She had wonderful American clothes and presents for all of us. I can remember how hurt she was at the little attention all

At midnight Nurse Hilton looked in to see Wilmett wanted anything. She found her sleep with her head resting on her hand. he went in again at four o'clock in the morn- g, and found Wilmett lying in the same po- tion, only she had ceased to breathe.

Mary was sharing Nurse Hilton's room with her, and together they washed and did all the last offices for Wilmett. They decided to wait for me to wake and break their loss to my parents. When I saw Mary's face at the door, I knew what had happened.

I thought it would be terrible to tell my mother, but she gave a long sigh of relief. "Thank God," she said, "my darling has escaped at last!" My father said, "I can't bear it!" and turned his face to the wall.

I went back to Wilmett's room by myself, after I had told them. When I found myself in her empty, silent room I knew that my childhood had gone with her.

Now that I look back on my own education as a child I believe that more than half of it came from Wilmett, and did not cease with her death. Nor was it an education wholly without benefits.

The good of mankind means the attainment by every man of all the happiness which he can enjoy without diminishing the happiness of his fellow men. —T. H. HUXLEY.

It is true that I had acquired very little accurate or practical knowledge. I had chosen a bad goal, and had a faulty method of approaching life, yet I was older and more responsible for my age than most girls of eighteen are today. I was beginning to earn my own living, yet the main task in life had not even been presented to me—I was unable to disassociate my thoughts from my wishes; and therefore had no moral freedom.

This made me a constant danger to myself and others. My goal was a prestige goal and, in consequence, I lacked social interest. I had had the immense advantage of loving parents, who had done nothing to undermine my creative confidence. I had known intimately many good and understanding people. I believed in life and was eagerly prepared to do my share toward improving it; but there was a flaw in the golden bowl of my youth—as there is in many others' golden bowls—I had not learned that there is no way of improving anything until one has learned how to improve oneself. THE BIGGEST BOX ON THE SHELF

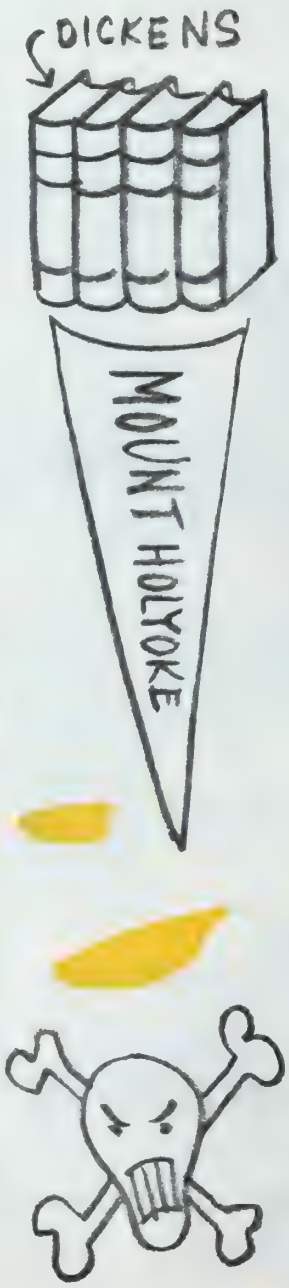
The Sunshine

BY JAN WEYL

WHEN Nan and I were thirteen we went into busine for the fifth time. Our firm, Sunshine Enterprise Inc., had already been responsible for a newspape bakeshop, racing form and detective agency, eac formed with one aim in mind: money—as much and as fas as possible; and each thwarted by the same obstacle: parent

Now we again needed money. We were planning to tak a New York success course, and wanted to finish it and b glamorous by the time we were fourteen.

Sunshine activities had been stagnant for three month following the sudden demise of The Sunshine Detectiv Agency, until Nan's and my parents went to Florida to gether. The day they left Nan got a notice from the public library that she owed thirty cents for an overdue book. And my grandmother, who was taking care of Nan and me at our house, sent me downtown to give twenty-eight cents to a rental library for a book she was returning.



The combination was too much for Nan and me. The Sunshine Lending Library opened the doors of my father's library for business two days later.

Since Nan's overdue book had given us the first inspiration for the library, she became head librarian. I was billed as "the writer" because I'd just finished the first chapter of my first novel, Wilma of the Prairie, in which Wilma's mother was dying and the heroine and her father were sobbing at the bedside. Nan thought that with my obvious writing ability I should have the opportunity of working with the books of other great authors.

Our main problem was rounding up a wide selection of books which would appeal to our clientele, an age group ranging from five to eighteen. We started with the nucleus of dad's collection of detective fiction, and easily solved the problem of more books by hiring two book boys, my brother Tom and his friend Ned, both aged seven. For ten cents apiece they hauled fifty books from Nan's empty house to our library, and switched most of mother's favorite books from our living room to the library.

My grandmother was deaf and took a nap each afternoon, so all action took place during her nap. Grandma, wh wasn't a heavy reader herself, didn't see any difference in the library or the living room, although she did remark that we certainly spent a lot of time reading books.

Nan and I chose the books to come from her house. The selection included everything from the Yale Alumni Quarterly (1919–36) to the classics. Our own reading didn't extend far beyond the Little Colonel and Five Little Peppers series, so we chose books mainly because of their bindings. A set of Shakespeare bound in morocco leather particularly attracted us. We were sure we had the best-bound books in town.

To give the best-bound books due display, Nan and I worked out a special arrangement which no other library in town had thought of. One shelf featured a patriotic display of a set of Thackeray bound in red, a set of poetry bound in white, and the Encyclopedia Americana bound in blue, with an American flag hanging above. Below this shelf we placed a collection of Dickens, bound in light blue, in honor of Mount Holyoke College, where I was planning to go, with a Mount Holyoke banner attached. Nan was aiming at Smith, but we couldn't find any books bound in gold, so she settled for Cornell and her father's set of Shakespeare. At the very top of the bookcase hung a large, imposing setting sun made of yellow cardboard, with the library's slogan printed in black letters: "Take ye a book." The Sunshine Lending Library had a definite look of distinction.

By the end of two of grandma's naps all the books were arranged and the library officially opened. Each Sunshine book was identified by a small slip of paper pasted inside the back cover which said "The Sunshine Lending Library" at the top, and gave a space below for the date due. We had had little actual experience with libraries of any kind, and combined the best elements of both free and renting libraries—the best elements being those that would make us the most money. Our sign, in the shape of a sunset, proclaimed "The Sunshine Lending Library. Books three cents a day first seven days, ten cents a day if not returned at the end of one week. Those not returning books will be punished by law," followed by a skull and crossbones. Tom, who was planning to study law, was engaged as the Sunshine Lawyer.

The Sunshine Lending Library made an immediate stir in the literary life of the neighborhood. Our first customer was a six-year-old who chose a copy of Chaucer, written in Old English. He kept the book six months. Another customer applied for a book giving the facts of life. Nan and I weren't sure what she meant, but were able to supply her

Going Places With Ben Schultz

HE'S A FOREMAN WITH A FUTURE AT LIBBEY-OWENS-FORD

Mary and Ben Schultz, of Rossford, Ohio.

by JOAN YOUNGER

PHOTOGRAPHS BY SOL LIBSOHN

BENJAMIN ADAM SCHULTZ—better known as Benny—was two when his father was killed in a factory accident and his mother was left with eleven children to bring up. Today, Benny, sitting in his cozy home with his three well-fed, well-dressed children and his pretty wife, thinking about his mother and that time, shakes his head and says, "She was determined and she was demanding, but I can't remember her ever telling us things were tough, or complaining."

She was Polish by birth; she could neither read nor write, so she took in washing and told her children there were only two important things in this world: getting along with people and making money.

Ben's two eldest brothers quit the fifth and sixth grades and went to work in the factory their father had been killed in. The family menu became a monotonous one of soup and potatoes except at Christmas, when walnuts and oranges did double duty as presents and food. And all except the smallest children learned how to plant onions or pick berries, carry papers and help with the washing.

"Mom always told us we were lucky to learn young that you couldn't live without hard work," Ben says; "and you know, I'd never want my kids to go through it, but I think we were."

It is very unlikely that Ben's family will ever be even threatened with such disaster. Ben's almost in the $5000-a-year tax bracket now. His precarious days as an odd jobber and a factory hand are behind him; he's a foreman with a future now. His children are healthy, easy-going youngsters. Freddie is eleven; he's the eldest. Judith Ann comes next; she's going on eight. Suzanne is six and very self-possessed. Freddie is a handy errand boy, and Judith Ann prides herself on being the school nurse—which means Hospitality's a habit at the Schultz home, and Mary's never too busy to invent a new game or settle a squabble for the kids and their friends.

"I still don't feel right in a business suit." Ben stops to hear news in the casting room. Remembering his own days a factory hand, he thinks a good boss should keep close to his n she takes the children who have nosebleeds to the lavatory; all of them get their own breakfasts and make their own beds, but—as Benny puts it—in one generation the Schultzes have advanced from "soup to nuts."

How? Ben says it took "confidence and competence." But those are not easy things to come by on the other side of the tracks. When Ben looks back—which is not often, because, like most of us, he's too concerned with the present to reflect long on the past—he thinks first of the influence of his mother, and second, of the influence of a woman for whom he worked.

Ben's first "real" job was when he was eight: four weeks of onion planting paid him $10. At nine he had his own paper route, which he completed before he went to school each morning. Then, the summer he was eleven, he got a job that was not only good, it was wonderful. He became a gardener's helper on the estate of William E. Bock, the multimillionaire inventor of a bottle-blowing machine and a roller bearing. Benny's twenty-year-old brother Joe was the first to land at the Bocks'; it was through his job as head gardener that Ben and his brother Stanley, then nine, got their gardener's-helper jobs, and two sisters, Valerie and Stella, got jobs as maids.

For four years Ben worked with Mrs. Bock, who took it upon herself to play a combination fairy godmother and Dutch uncle to the five Schultzes. She gave them their meals, clothed them for school each fall, paid them well for summer work and work after school during the winter; but most of all, she showed them a way of life and a faith. She refused to hire them if they quit or missed any classes; she insisted they take naps or rest every day, gave them a room each where they could change, rest—and live, if they wanted to (all but Stanley didn't want to). She made them welcome in the big, well-stocked Bock library at any time whatsoever, and insisted that they all be clean, tidy, well Until their dream home comes along, the Schultzes live a convenient quarter of a mile from the factory. The present girl friend house—company owned—rents for $16.50 a month.

How to make the most of the noon hour: Ben likes to share a sociable hamburger with Mary, often brings home a delicatessen pickup if she's tired. Family spends $29 weekly for food.

mannered, socially graceful and very considerate of every living thing on the estate—be it bird, beast, flower, servant or family. If they didn't live up to her high standards, she gave them gentle lectures, usually in the form of fables in which loving-kindness triumphed and hostility beat a retreat. Whenever the boys got into squabbles, Mrs. Bock seemed to appear from nowhere, to talk about love and forgiveness, and to tell them that they were fine boys and had a chance of becoming fine men.

The summer day a tornado ripped through Toledo and stormed around the Bock estate, Mrs. Bock noticed Benny cowering with fright like a whipped pup and told him to come with her into the vast living room and sit down in the big chair that faced the garden window, and watch the storm quietly. She herself sat down in the chair opposite, and, together, the small, scared boy and the calm, imposing millionaire's wife sat and watched out the long, terrible tornado without a word. When the noise of the wind began to fade, Mrs. Bock rose and suggested they go see what damage had been done. She never spoke of the incident and neither did Ben, but he lost all fear of thunderstorms that day—and of a great many other things too.

"She was a great old girl," Benny says. "She taught me a lot. I don't mean the books and table manners exactly—she gave me a lot of confidence. She made you feel like you must be some good because she thought you were."

Ben met the third woman in his life, Mary Taylor, now Mrs. Ben Schultz, when he was twenty and she was nineteen. She's of Irish descent—"away back"; her hair is curly black and her eyes are hazel. They met on a spring night twelve years ago. Mary had just graduated from high school and taken her first job. He'd wanted desperately to go to college, but he had to work in order to pay his way, and at the end of his first year he found that, for all his strong body and disciplined ways, he couldn't make it—the words in the textbooks took to whirling around the room when he tried to study after eight hours of factory labor. He either had to quit school or quit eating, so he left Toledo University, pigeonholed his dream of becoming a public accountant, and began to make the Libbey-Owens-Ford glassworks his career.

He hoped that when he had made enough money, and saved some of it, and had some extra energy, he'd go back to school at night. Because he wanted an ice-cream cone on a June night in 1936, his plans changed. He drove up to the frozen-custard stand in his jalopy and fate, fresh, curly-haired and dimpled, walked out to wait on him. Ben says now he was immediately attracted to Mary, though he can't say just why. Mary says she hardly noticed him at all, "except his blue eyes." It was her first job: she had just graduated from high school and didn't know what she was going to do. She had her choice of business school or staying home. Her family weren't wealthy, but they were comfortably off. The drive-in job was a summertime stopgap.

"I never have figured out just how we got married," Ben says. "I never asked her to marry me. She just kept saying 'when we're married,' and what's a fellow to do?"

"Oh, you," Mary says. "You drove over to the stand every night for ten nights running just to drive me home—which was only a block away. And who got me that wedding ring and engagement ring all at one time? Before I'd even said yes."

In November, they were married before a justice of the peace. Ben had $65 in the bank, his jalopy and $30-a-week pay. Mary had spent what money she earned at the drive-in on clothes: the last of it bought her hunter-green velvet wedding dress (which she still wears, she's that slim). Nine years later they were married again in church. In the years in between, Mary observed Catholic rituals with Ben and the children, but weighed her own attitude until a persuasive priest did what Ben had vowed he would never do—asked her to join the Catholic Church.

For six months they lived with Mary's parents. "They're wonderful people," Ben says. "But that's no way to bring up a family. Better to be broke in a place of your own." They moved out when Freddie was on the way, and, as Judith Ann and Suzie followed, Ben began worrying again about getting ahead. Some of the words of Mrs. Bock began ringing in his ears. An educated man with confidence in himself, she often said, need never stand still. Ben thought about this and then he sat down and wrote a two-page letter to his boss. It was right to the point: it asked why, with four years' high school and one year of college, he still was nothing but a factory hand. Was it his fault—or was it the company's? Should he go to another outfit? He never got a written answer to that letter. But two months later he got another kind of answer—a promotion. It seemed the letter arrived when the company was looking for four men to help direct wartime expansion, and Ben was placed, night foreman, in the new optical branch of the glassworks. Six years later, when he was a full-fledged foreman, he got another answer: the letter he had written came back to him from his boss with a note. "A letter from a twenty-six-year-old has-been you might want to read," the note said.

Today Ben runs the Tuf-flex department—which, as its name implies, makes glass "tuf" and heat-resistant, even when it's flexible, as in streamlined-car windows. He has 25 men under him, and his small office, shared with his secretary (a man) is right off the factory division handling the glass. His men, and the front office, call him Benny. He believes (just as he does at home) that encouragement is a stronger stimulus to work than discouragement; he rarely bawls anyone out, makes it a point to keep the men informed on how the department is doing, and keeps the door open to grievances and personal problems.

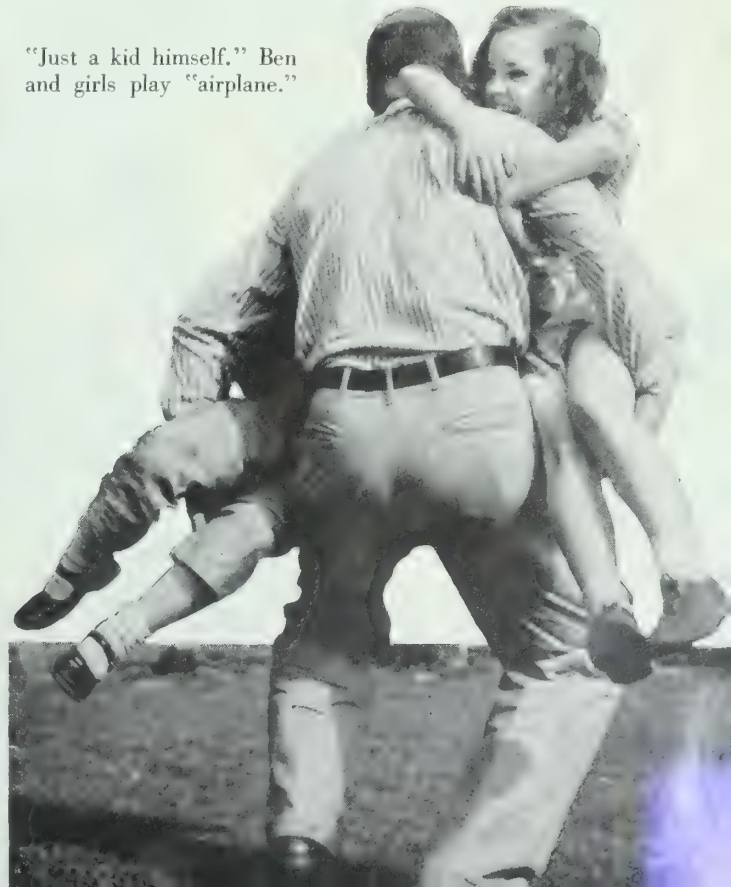
When Ben was one of the ordinary workers in the factory, he was a member of the union; as a foreman he is not, but he retains his belief that a good union benefits management and labor alike.

Cowboys and Arthur Godfrey are Suzanne's favorite people. "Doing just everything" will be her career.

Self-service department: Judy likes to make lunch for her 6-year-old sister. Suzie goes to public school while Fred and Judy attend parochial, as part of religious training.

There's no headache in a haircut when Frank Sedlar wields the shears. He used to barber President Taft, keeps two yellow lovebirds to intrigue his young clients.

Some time back, he ran for the Board of Education as a Democrat in hopes of helping along his educational dream: regular vocational courses in the public schools, or at least a general mechanical course, similar to the general-science courses which are taught now. He got licked, but hopes to try again one of these days. He also hopes—and with very good reason—to climb higher in the administration of the company. To do this, he believes that he must learn more of the operation of the plant as a whole, of the division he works in, of human relations in general, and the workers in Libbey-Owens-Ford in particular.



The last should be easy enough. Ben never gets anywhere he is going—except to work—on time because he always has to stop and talk to people. Judith Ann is like him. She frequently can't play downstairs after supper, but must stay in her room because it has taken her two hours and a half to walk the five blocks home from school. She says it's not her fault: there is a new football stadium being built near the school which she must inspect; the barber keeps two yellow lovebirds; a television set is on display at the radio store; at least three children live between her and the corner, and when the children on the other side are at home, it seems silly "Important citizens wear shirttails in," and Mary helps Fred look the part. Her talent for sewing holds clothes expenses to $250 yearly.

Judy runs "cut-rate" errands at 5¢ per trip. She'll get an allowance when she's 12, knows "where money comes from—how it goes."

"Just a kid himself." Ben and girls play "airplane."

"All play and no work makes a good Sunday." Ben and brother-in-law Frank Domalski (who taught him to bake cakes) do the cooking—on Friday night.

Success can't mean a thing without people to care for—who care for you.

to come in first and then run right back out again. There is so very much to do in this world and so many wonderful people to talk to.

The two other children share in this family feeling, but with more restraint. Suzanne carries about her an air of delight that is as satisfying as the first crocus of April. If there is no one handy to talk to, she will talk softly to herself in a sweet singsong of small stories, or gently tell her dolls how to behave. Her stories have a beginning and a middle and an end and are related with wide-eyed feeling. Freddie, breathless and quick like his mother, has an eagerness to oblige that makes him a champion errand runner and good-turn doer, for all the fact that he is a bit too young for the local Boy Scout troop.

Their home is on the Dixie Highway, where it stretches east out of Toledo, cuts through the Libbey-Owens-Ford property to become Main Street to the factory town of Rossford. The Schultzes' front porch sits well back from the highway traffic, and, since the gray-and-white frame-and-shingle house they live in is one of the few houses still owned by the company, they pay a mere $16.50 a month for rent! "We expect a home really our own someday," Ben says, "but this will do nicely until one comes along."

In front of their house is a wide green lawn that melts into the next-door neighbors' unchecked by fence or shrubbery. In back is another lawn, cut into by the several (Continued on Page 276)

SEVENTEEN MAKE-OVER

Few of us can bear to discard a dress that has been a favorite. Perhaps it is the line of the dress we like, or the quality of the fabric. Sometimes it is the color that is so flattering. In any case, nine out of ten times there is a way to save it from an outmoded fate . . . you may even like it better after the change. The secret is in the subtleness of the alteration. Example: A 6-inch border on the lower edge of a skirt is less conspicuous than a 2-inch border. We have experimented with seventeen suits, coats and dresses. We have used ribbon, quilting, knitting, shirring, pleating, contrasts and fur. The results you can see for yourself . . . consult the small sketches to see the clothes before the changes. ★ BY NORA O'LEARY

To make up for a Sunday splurge, Mrs. Schultz serves easy-on-the-bu main dishes during the week. Tonight it's Polish cabbage bun

IT'S A MATTER OF CHOICE

BY LOUELLA G. SHOUER

THIRTY DOLLARS a week is tops for food spending in the Schultz budget. This doesn't allow for thoughtless splurging, but neither does it mean they can't have the pleasure of a good roast-beef or chicken dinner with all the trimmings once a week. It's planned for! During the week their dinners aren't skimpy by any means. They are good meals and hearty, but they are inexpensive. Often the main dish is a Polish specialty, such as knydlie—potato dumplings which Mrs. Schultz serves with cottage cheese and fried onions.

A wise shopper and an economical cook, she is thrifty in many small ways that save money. She uses margarine as a spread, evaporated or dried milk instead of fresh for cooking.

Outside of occasional purchases of fresh fruits and vegetables for salads, she buys canned fruits and vegetables exclusively. There's a big saving here that adds up to quite a bit in a week's time.

Nothing goes to waste in her kitchen. Even the celery leaves are dried and kept in a jar for seasoning.

No one is shockproof to the grocery bill these days. Here are some economical menus that will help out the lean part of the week and some that cost more when you feel like splurging.

"chicken every Sunday" at the ultzes'. Occasionally roast pork gets a y, but chicken braised in the pressure cepan is their all-time favorite for fes- e meals. A popular dish at their house week nights is cabbage bundles. "Good ngs come in small bundles," Mrs. ultz says. The only similarity in the o menus on page 216 is that they are th good to eat, both well balanced nutri- nally, yet one costs considerably more an the other. Chicken, in the first place, sts more than hamburger; fresh toma- es at this season more than canned mato sauce; a can of cling peaches less an the makings for an upside-down ke. Cabbage, potatoes and carrots are ually the cheapest fresh vegetables and rs. Schultz leans on them heavily.

POLISH CABBAGE BUNDLES

hop 1 medium onion and sauté in small mount of fat for a few minutes. Add 1 ound ground beef, or ½ pound ground eef and ½ pound ground pork. Sauté ith the onions. Season with 1¾ tea- poons salt and a little pepper. When eat is browned, combine with 1 cup ooked rice and 2 tablespoons chopped reen pepper. Add 1 unbeaten egg and nix well. Separate 15–20 leaves from a arge head of cabbage. Parboil in salted vater. Drain well. Place heaping table- spoon of the meat-and-rice mixture in he center of each leaf and wrap leaf round it. Secure with a toothpick if necessary. Place in a baking dish and pour 1 can tomato sauce over them. Dot with pieces of margarine. Bake, covered, in a moderately hot oven, 375° F., 40–45 minutes. Pour sauce over the cabbage bundles when you serve them.

Both the above menus feature fresh pork, usually plentiful this month; but, as everyone knows, a shoulder cut costs less than the loin. While fresh cauliflower, green beans and salad greens are not exactly expensive, use canned green beans for your vegetable and the cabbage in place of more expensive greens for the salad and you can cut down your meal cost considerably.

PORK PAPRIKA

Cut 1½ pounds fresh pork shoulder into 1-inch cubes. Brown in 3 tablespoons fat with 1 pound onions, sliced or chopped, in heavy pan. Then add 2 green peppers cut in strips, 1 tablespoon paprika, salt and pepper to taste and 1 small can tomato paste. Add just enough water to cover the meat and vegetables. Put on the lid and simmer 1 hour or until pork is tender. Reseason to taste. Serve with freshly cooked rice, noodles or mashed potatoes.

Sauerkraut Casserole

Here are two oven meal combinations. Both have fruit desserts—yet look at the difference in cost! A slice of ham for baking should be a thick one, weighing at least 1½ pounds, and ham at today's prices costs real money; yet this is such a good way of cooking ham it's worth having macaroni and cheese several times to save up for it. While some ham could be used in the sauerkraut-casserole dish, canned luncheon meat costs less and adds good flavor too.

SAUERKRAUT CASSEROLE

Cook ½ pound link sausages and cut into ½-inch pieces. Dice ½ pound cooked ham or pork luncheon meat. Combine with 1 apple, chopped, 1 carrot, diced, 1 onion, chopped, and 1 potato, grated on coarse side of grater. Arrange 2 pounds sauerkraut in layers with meat and diced vegetables. Moisten with 1½ cups seasoned stock made from bouillon cubes or meat paste and water. Bake, covered, in a moderate oven, 350° F., 1½ hours.

Every Sunday the Schultz family dress in their best and have dinner in the dining room. There are flowers on the table—their favorite braised chicken.

GENERAL ELECTRIC

Just too Tired

BY MARGARET DAVIDSON

ARE women really the weaker sex they are often said to be? With litt more than half the bodily strength of men, they still continue, on t average, to outlive men—by as much as five years—and in the hon and out of it often do a physical job close to, and sometimes equal t that of many men.

Why is it, then, that many a homemaker, like Mary Schultz, ofte finds herself at the end of the day "just too tired to move"? It's true th some days she may carry a load of wet clothes weighing 20 pounds or mor tote a vacuum cleaner weighing close to 20 pounds upstairs and dow carry dinner dishes weighing as much as 11 pounds back and forth fro kitchen to dining room; shift a heavy chest, weighing perhaps as much a or more than she does, to dust behind it; lift a sick youngster weighing 3 to 40 pounds from bed to chair.

But is it the amount of work, or how they do it, that makes women s tired? There must be ways of making heavy work lighter, of doing it wit less effort, less fatigue, or women never could have set the rigorous recor that they did at wartime work. Then they sometimes cut shells weighin 17 to 100 pounds, lifted others weighing 20 pounds apiece; made by han cores weighing 45 pounds apiece; shoveled 20 to 25 tons of crude minera a day, lifting it to a height of 2½ feet; pushed loads as heavy as 750 pounds; lifted others weighing as much as 58 per cent of their own body weight, although 35 per cent is often given as a safe maximum.

How did women do such heavy work without too great fatigue, and even injury, particularly to weak back and abdominal muscles? Because they learned to do their work the easy way; learned how to stand, to sit, to lift a heavy load; to sit at some jobs, to stand at others, and alternate the two so as not to get too tired at either; to break their work with rest periods, morning and afternoon; to eat plenty of energy-building foods to give them the strength to do their jobs.

Many homemakers would find that housework makes them less tired if they would take a tip from their sisters in industry, and adapt some of their working ways in doing many household jobs.

★ HOW AMERICA LIVES ★

Most women raise windows the wrong way—body bent over from a distance, with arms spread wide, thus giving themselves a "kink" in the back, or, worse, a misplaced vertebra. To raise a window easily, stand close to it and facing away from it; then, with arms spread no wider than need be, and stooping a little, bring muscles of the legs and thighs into play. Should the window still prove stubborn, place a short stick against the top and center of the frame, hold another vertically up against it, and tap the end of the vertical stick lightly with a hammer. . . . Windows over sinks and others hard to reach should be easy-to-open casements.

Reaching up to get down a seldom-used platter or vase high on a cupboard shelf, too high to reach with comfort, may put a strain upon the back. A sturdy stool or stepladder handy to such high spots saves overreaching. . . . Another sure way to save stretching is to store the most-used utensils and equipment within easy reach. . . . A sure time- and step-saver, too, is to keep together things used together: in the kitchen, all the makings of the breakfast, all the makings of a cake; about the house, all the cleaning supplies in one handy basket; supplies for sewing near the sewing machine, and the machine always in place near a light-giving window.

to Move—

Women who do their own laundry carry as much as 20 pounds of wet clothes to the line—often quite a distance. Better to make more trips, with lighter loads. Better still to use a child's cart or wagon. Better than either, a waist-high and wheeled cart like this saves trips, saves lifting, and much bending and stooping too. . . . The right working height saves tiresome backbending at other stand-up jobs.

DI PIETRO

Many women stand 6 to 8 hours a week to iron. Constant standing may cause menstrual troubles, aggravate varicose veins. Ironing can be done easily sitting down if the ironer sits well back in a chair that allows knees to bend without constricting blood vessels, and with the body erect, arms free, and feet at rest. A new low-height ironing board allows ample leg room.

Week-end groceries for a family of four may weigh as much as 54 pounds. Heavy lifting may result in bone deformities, in menstrual difficulties. To spare back and abdominal muscles, housewives should learn to stand close to the load, feet 8 to 12 inches apart, squat until the body is level with the load, then, pushing up with the toes, lift it with leg and thigh muscles.

Women who make 3 beds a day the hard way—back and forth, from side to side—travel ¾ of a mile a week. They could cut this a third by making beds one side at a time, each side complete. Bed-making is less backbreaking for those who bend to their work from the hips, keeping back and shoulders straight, stomach in.

Climbing stairs takes more energy than walking on a level, puts a strain on back and heart. Going up with body bent into an awkward question mark only adds to the strain. Those who would go up the easy way keep back erect, head up, let strong legs and thighs lift them from step to step. . . . A "collection basket" for odds and ends kept near stairs saves many upward trips.

JUDGE ABBEY AND THE FOUR ELVES

and watched her talking. He smiled at the babble of her light, warm voice, he admired the articulation of her pretty lips, and he adored the innocent wisdom of her eyes. He did not hear a word she said. Outside, the sun shone brightly and the snow lay deep over the quiet village.

"And at eight sharp, we all proceed to Judge Abbey's house," Mary was saying enthusiastically, "and range ourselves outside his parlor window, and sing The First Noel very loudly, because of course the judge is deaf, and then we shout in unison, 'Merry Christmas, Judge Abbey!' You'll be in the kitchen dressed as Santa Claus and when we're all inside you'll bring in the birthday cake with ninety candles on it—it isn't the judge's birthday until next Wednesday, but we thought it more fun to honor him Christmas Eve. And Bert Willington will bring the cider and Jeb Wilson is supplying the Christmas tree and — "

. A word or two began retroactively to penetrate Doctor Gates' pleasant meditation. "Who," he asked, suddenly starting, "will be in the kitchen dressed as Santa Claus?"

"You, darling," Mary answered guilelessly. "I told the committee you wanted to contribute to the fun, too, though if a baby comes you can't be present, only I believe none is planning to come tonight."

"What committee, Mary?"

"The committee in charge of Judge Abbey's Ninetieth Birthday Surprise Party. Bill, you haven't forgotten the judge's party; as a physician you must have noticed the whole town's in a fever over it."

"Mary," he said kindly but firmly, "I will not be in the kitchen dressed as Santa Claus, and I will not bear in a cake with ninety candles on it. It would look undignified and, in fact, I would feel like a fool."

"You won't, dear," Mary said, smiling into his eyes, "because it will make everyone happy, and because dear old Judge Abbe counting on it so, even though it's suppo to be a surprise. And as for dignity," went on, and reached over for his ha "remember this isn't Johns Hopkins a more, or the Lahey Clinic. Remember Stillbrook, New Hampshire, and we're human beings together that's what wanted when we came here."

"I still say no," Bill said crossly. "Sa Claus is a superstition who should not encouraged, and dear old Judge Abb can ——" But the telephone interrupt his recommendation, and he went into t hall to answer it.

"Doctor Gates, it's Mrs. Hopper—Jud Abbey's housekeeper." Her voice rattl with exasperation. "Doctor, it's them elv again!"

"I see." Bill Gates' face was grave a professional. "Bothering him again, a they?"

"Yes, doctor. But this time he's taken his bed. He says he won't get up un they've gone."

"I'll stop in and have a talk with him

"Thank you, doctor. 'Twould be a shan to spoil his party; and I declare, I've ha just about enough of his nonsense. Why ——

But Doctor Gates said good-by and hur up. Mary was clearing away the breakfa things.

"Judge Abbey's elves are back," he to her.

Mary's face filled with alarm. "Oh, dea they won't interfere with the party?"

His eyes twinkled. "I'll tell 'em not to.

Mary giggled. "Or maybe they should b invited. Poor judge—what a darling ol rattlepate he is! Good-by, dear. I've got t plot out a cake big enough to hold ninet candles. I think I'll bake it in the washtub.

Bill was putting on his overcoat. H caught Mary about her small waist. "I'

Sorry I was cross," he murmured, and drew her close. "I expect I'm just scared of making a spectacle of myself." He asked, unnecessarily, "You know I love you, don't you?"

Outdoors long blue shadows of bare elm trees interlaced over glistening snow, and the air tingled with the sound of sleigh bells, for Jeb Wilson had turned out in his crimson cutter. Christmas wreaths decorated the front doors of the white houses lining Main Street, and pale wood smoke rose straight in the air from the brick chimneys. Doctor Gates inhaled deeply and, full of Christmas optimism, strode to his blue coupé.

The judge's fine white house stands on the top of the rise of Main Street and lends a note of elegance to the simple village, for it has Ionic columns supporting a portico, and its front door is considered by experts a perfect specimen of Greek-revival grace. Mrs. Hopper opened the door this morning, and the doctor stamped off his feet and went up the wide stairs to the judge's bedroom. It is an enormous room, darkly furnished with carved walnut, but warm in winter with red wallpaper, sunlight and a hissing wood fire.

The optimist is as often wrong as the pessimist, but he is far happier.

High in the vast four-poster, beneath sheets and blankets and a Rose of Sharon quilt, lay the body of Judge Abbey, and only his sharp blue eyes were alive and visible.

"Look out!" the old voice shrilled piercingly, and then even the eyes disappeared. Doctor Gates stood still, and presently the top of Judge Abbey emerged once more. "'Y gory," he sighed, "you almost stepped on one."

Doctor Gates proceeded to the judge's bedside. The voice of the sympathetic psychologist, he remembered ironically, is supposed to be calm and quiet above all things. "You realize, your honor," he shouted at the top of his lungs, for the old man was very deaf, and while he shouted he drew the covers gently down and made a routine examination of the ancient pulse, the valiant heart and lungs, "you realize that you thought I almost stepped on one. But it was in your eyes, not mine."

The blue eyes sparked at him. The old man cried, "Do I have to go all over it again with you? They're here again, the same four, plain as day. I know their faces."

"What are they wearing?"

"Oh, I've told you a dozen times. Green overcoats, red breeches! Why can't you remember, boy?"

Doctor Gates remembered perfectly well, but he wished to test the persistence of the old man's recurrent hallucination. "And did they disturb you this morning?"

The judge implied the affirmative with a series of archaic words which are best described as "blankety-blank-blank!" Then he lowered his voice to a whisper. "They were laying for me. Hadn't barely got out of bed before one of 'em took me off balance. Barked my shin on the rocker. Thought I'd brave 'em out, but the second one hid my slippers, and the third tangled up my galluses. When the fourth turned up the rug and I fell smack flat and winded myself, I was beaten. I gave up. I've taken to my bed, boy. For good." Suddenly he pointed at his marble washstand. "All right, go ahead and gloat, you blank-blank little devil!"

Involuntarily Doctor Gates looked, too, although of course there was nothing but the washstand to see.

Bill Gates took another tack. It is difficult to yell sympathetically, but he attempted to. "Judge, in a few days you'll be ninety years old! It's only natural that you mightn't be quite as steady on your feet as you used to be, and sometimes that your eyes should play tricks on you. Now if I were you I'd rest awhile and then ——"

"Are you calling me a liar, boy?"

"No, I am not!" Doctor Gates was filled with misgivings. As a psychologist, he thought, he would make a good plumber, for so far he had only increased the old man's distress. "Lie down, your honor."

The judge sank back and his blue eyes suddenly filled with tears. "And I was looking forward so to my surprise party!"

"But surely the elves won't stay for the party. They'll clear out when all those people arrive and you can get up again."

"Oh, no. This time they're here to stay."

Doctor Gates hid his start of dismay. "What do you mean?"

"This time they brought their baggage with them, boy. They've got little green satchels, stored 'em neatly on my closet shelf. They've moved in." He prepared to retreat under the covers again. "And I'm not going to let them trip me up and pull chairs out from under me any more. I've taken to my bed for good and all. I'm an old man and I'm beaten." He buried his face entirely this time, for he did not wish the boy to see him weeping. "Go away," his muffled voice whimpered. "Tell them to call off the party."

Bill Gates sighed. He stood for a moment longer by the bed, deeply touched, and feeling helpless and incompetent. At last he went out of the room. He left a mild sedative for the judge with Mrs. Hopper, and went on to his other calls.

But the problem of the judge's hallucination kept nipping at his mind. He had never enjoyed being defeated by the limitations of science, but raising the white flag to a small band of nonexistent elves made him truly bitter. His Christmas optimism was gone.

At noon he stopped at the post office for his mail. The post office and telephone exchange are operated simultaneously and competently by Miss Mabel Badger, a broad outspoken maiden of sixty with healthy red cheeks.

"Morning, Doctor Gates." There was a derisive glint in her clear eyes as she handed over his mail. "Hear you're going to play Santa tonight for Judge Abbey." She had guessed it was the kind of thing Doctor Gates wouldn't be caught dead doing.

"The judge has asked me to call the party off," he told her.

Miss Badger's jaw dropped. "Doctor, you can't mean it! Is it his elves again?"

"It is. He's taken to his bed and won't get up."

She planted her fists on her sturdy hips. "Well, now, that's the limit! And I've made a string of popcorn for his tree that would stretch from here to North Conway. Isn't there anything any of us can do for him?"

"I don't think so."

She leaned across the counter and powerfully gripped his arm. "Doctor Gates, you know all about that psychology stuff, and we're backing you. Try again!"

He smiled then, grateful for her confidence, but he was not hopeful.

He stepped across the street to the bank, where Bert Willington stopped him on the threshold. Bert is sexton of the church and a firm supporter of the local Anti-Saloon League, but unexpectedly he is as wide in all directions as he is tall, and his spirit is irrepressibly merry. This morning, however, his round face was woeful as a child's.

"Doc, is it true about the surprise party bein' called off? About the judge's elves movin' in on him?"

"It's true, Bert." Bill Gates avoided the appeal in Bertram's eyes.

"Gory, 'twon't seem like Christmas at all, not givin' that party." Bert's sigh rose into the frosty air in a vast cloud. "Ayah, we'd planned it so careful, too, just what would give the old gentleman pleasure. Wish we could get rid of them elves once and for all."

"I've tried, Bert. I can't do anything about old age." And he left Bert on the bank steps looking fat and disconsolate.

The musty steam heat of the bank was like an anesthetic after the clear cold of outdoors. The doctor endorsed a check for an office call and went up to the window. Asa Spade, the president, appeared behind the grill.

"Good morning, Doctor Gates. I understand the party's been called off tonight on account"—he coughed deprecatingly behind his hand—"of the elves."

"That's right."

"I wondered if it would do any good if I talked to him, as president of the bank, a reliable citizen. Perhaps my word ——"

"No, it upsets him to argue with him."

"Ayah. It does seem a shame though. And I—ahem—made a rather handsome financial contribution to the committee. I'd have thought you'd know how to deal with him. Your psychology and such ——"

Doctor Gates had heard enough about psychology for one morning, and he left the bank abruptly. He went home to dinner.

Mary wore the glowing look that came from standing over a hot stove all morning and enjoying it immensely. She sat him down to a robust meal, and he felt guilty telling her the bad news.

And when he told her she pushed back her chair and stood over him with an expression which actually made his heart skip.

"William Gates, you are not going to let four elves defeat you. There's an old man with a feeble brain, and here you are with a smart one. And you say you're licked!"

Women had the most exasperating way of rationalizing the irrational. "But, Mary, it's nothing but old age, and that's one thing even a smart man can't cure."

"Old age, no, William Gates, but elves' yes!" Her chin quivered suddenly. "The cake is beautiful, the whole evening will be beautiful, and the poor old man will want to die if he has to miss it." Her chin firmed warningly once more. "Now you look here, William Gates; if you're as clever as I think you are and the town thinks you are—yes, and as you think you are—then this is the time to prove it. You think of something to get rid of those elves. Because Judge Abbey's got to have his party." She marched out of the room.

He that lives on hopes will die fasting. —FRANKLIN.

Her husband went in despair to the back of the house to open his office. The little waiting room wasn't crowded. Only three or four patients filed through: Millie Coolidge, who was expecting; the man with the powder burns from deer season; a child with a cough. And Miss Partridge, who still had the pain in the palm of her hand.

No one in Stillbrook believed in the judge's elves, but Doctor Gates was the only soul in town who didn't believe in Miss Partridge's affliction. He had diagnosed it long ago as hysterical, and in his present state of despondency and exasperation he decided he could be bothered with it no longer; this was one case, at least, that he was going to cure here and now.

"Miss Partridge," he announced, "it is high time we got to the bottom of that pain." She was well named: she was alert and bulging-eyed, and seemed always about to take rustling flight in alarm. "I have tried to spare you this, but I believe now it is my only course." He took a deep breath and announced portentously, "I must operate."

"Oh-o-oh, doctor, must you really?" Her good hand fluttered fearfully in her hat and her hair and over her dress, but the doctor observed the gleam of eagerness in her rolling eyes.

"I am convinced of it." He washed his hands solemnly and put on sterile gloves. Then he donned a surgical mask and glared at her over it. "Are you ready, Miss Partridge?"

The poor thing looked frightened to death, but she climbed onto the table with remarkable agility.

"I am going to blindfold you, Miss Partridge. I shall have to use a local anesthetic, and it may be rather unpleasant to watch."

"Oh-o-oh, doctor!" she warbled again, fearful and thrilled.

He bandaged her eyes and injected a shot of procaine into her arm. Then with a small surgical knife he made an incision about a half inch long in her palm, exclaimed "Ah!" and bound it up neatly in yards of gauze and

And the pain is gone?"

Oh, of course! I can't feel a thing any re. And doctor, may I—may I have the dle? Just to show people?"

She departed in high spirits, and Bill tes, sitting down at his desk, allowed him-f to smile at last. The power of suggestion! Suddenly he sat galvanized. The problem Miss Partridge's pain wasn't very different m the problem of Judge Abbey's elves. was rigid for some minutes, ideas flashing nost visibly across his face. It was five lock, and his waiting room was empty.

First he telephoned the Stillbrook station oston & Maine branch). Then in turn he ephoned Asa Spade, Bert Willington and abel Badger.

"Sure," Mabel said. "I'll put my boy end in charge here. Be right over."

In only a few minutes they were all in his fice, and hurriedly Bill Gates explained his an to them.

"Oh, now, really, Doctor Gates!" Asa ade, the bank president, protested. "You n't really expect us to take part in a thing e that!" Bert Willington's round face was bious, and Mabel Badger put her hands her hips and said, "Of all the crazy ideas! hat is it, doctor, psychology?"

"It most certainly is, and even though you ink it's crazy, you all begged me to use it is morning. And you were willing to do ything to help. I am not going to fail u—or myself, or Mary, or Judge Abbey. his is what I plan to do, and this is how you n help."

"Doc," Bert Willington exploded, "I'm ith you!"

Mabel clapped her hands. "Me too!"

"But really ——" Asa wavered.

"Asa Spade," Mabel turned on him, "Judge Abbey gave you your start in life and you can do this much for him. Why, he taught you to count when you were a little squirt, and where'd you be now, I'd like to know, if you couldn't count?"

"And don't forget your financial contribution," Bert reminded.

That settled it. Asa picked up his gray fedora. "Let's go," he said.

Out they went and strode up Main Street to the judge's house, while Bill Gates gave them a final coaching on the way.

They waved Mrs. Hopper aside and marched straight up to the judge's bedroom, where the old man still lay in his bed with the covers up to his nose.

"Your honor," Asa Spade announced in his most impressive bank-president voice, "we have come to get rid of your elves."

The judge whipped down the covers and sat up, hope beginning to shine in his face. "You have? How?"

"We are going to drive them out of the house."

The blue eyes clouded and hope died. "But they'll come right back, lad. I drove them out myself once, but they came around and got in the back door when Mrs. Hopper wasn't looking."

"They won't this time, your honor. We are going to ——"

"Sh!" Doctor Gates held up his hand. "Don't let them hear you."

Asa bent down and shouted confidingly in the judge's ear, "We are going to put them on the train to Boston!"

Mabel bent and added, "Just slam the door and let 'er rip!"

The judge opened his mouth then and howled with delight. "Wonderful, wonderful, wonderful! They'll never be able to find their way back from Boston. Oh, you wonderful boys, and you, too, my girl, to think of such a wonderful thing!"

"All right," Doctor Gates advised, "let's not waste any time."

And in that instant the judge's handsome bedroom was transformed into a scene of the wildest activity, confused with shouts, the crashing of furniture being overturned, arms and legs flailing, and, above all the din, the judge's howls of encouragement. He hopped up and down on the bed in his long white nightshirt, directing the efforts of his champions: "That's right, get that one first, under the rocker! Good, Bertie, splendid, you've cornered him! Now, Mabel, down under the bed—there's been one of 'em lurking there all afternoon!"

"Here's one hiding behind the door," Doctor Gates shouted, grabbing a fistful of air.

And Asa, whisking his gray fedora about, exclaimed with a perfectly straight face, "There goes the fourth, out into the hall!" And added, with what Doctor Gates thought showed real psychological insight, "Why, he's got red pants on!"

"Of course he has," the judge shrilled with delight, bouncing up and down, "they all have. That's the trickiest one, Asa; you'll have to watch him."

Mrs. Hopper appeared in the door and stood rooted in open-mouthed astonishment.

"Out of the way, woman!" Bert yelled, perspiring freely. "We're rounding up the judge's elves." And Mrs. Hopper emitted a shriek and vanished.

"All right, this way!" Doctor Gates commanded, when Mabel had emerged red-faced from under the bed. And there was a tumbling and bumping as they went through the motions of maneuvering reluctant elves down a flight of stairs. The judge hung over the banisters, bleating with joy.

"Ouch," Bert yelped, for he was now thoroughly in the spirit of the undertaking. "Mine bit me!"

They were in the hall now, making scuffling motions among themselves. Only Asa's elf seemed willing to be led away quietly, perhaps because it was being led away by a bank president. Then Doctor Gates flung open the wide door.

"Out you go, you blankety-blanks, and may you blankety-blank-blank!" The judge, hanging almost perpendicular over the stair well, pronounced a picturesque sentence, and the others paused below in admiration. "Pardon me, dear girl," he concluded courteously, addressing Mabel.

"That's all right, judge. I'm going to save some of those for my boy friend."

"So long, your honor," Doctor Gates called then. "Don't worry about elves any more. We're off to the train now. Your troubles are over!" And the three men and the woman burst out-of-doors, across the porch, and down the walk.

"DANG it all," Asa muttered, peeking back over his shoulder, "he's up in his bedroom window and he's going to watch us all the way to the station."

"Of course," Bill Gates said. "He must see it from beginning to end, in order to be convinced."

"Well, come on, then," Mabel cried, wrapping her red muffler securely under her red cheeks and preparing to advance.

"Who wants to stop now anyway?" Bert added. "This is more fun than a corn-huskin' bee. Git on there, critter!" He seized a snow shovel to implement his commands.

"Wait!" Doctor Gates held up his hand. He, too, was enjoying the enterprise, and such a thing as his personal dignity farthest from his thoughts. "Let us ro them into a pack," he advised sens "Then we can bring all our forces to and drive them down the street toget Mabel, you take the left flank, and take the right. Bert, you hold the cen Asa, you follow behind and play fielder, in case an elf gets away. Rea Forward!"

AND with a battle cry of attack that heard the length of Main Street they roun the judge's picket fence; they looked ba and in the window the judge was still h ping up and down, joy lighting his face that it shone like silver, for he indeed co really see four elves being driven away. shrieks and howls began to attract the tow people. Doctor Gate glanced back at hi and winked at Ber who cried, "Oops sorry! One of 'em' got loose! Quick, Asa he's gone up there o Sheriff Wakefield' porch!" And poo Asa, pale as the snow had to scuttle up ont the porch and grab nothing under the very eyes of Sheriff Wakefield, who had been attracted out-of-doors by the commotion and who observed Asa with sober conjecture.

They passed the doctor's house. "Hello, Mary!" He waved gaily to her and she waved bravely back, for that is the kind of devoted wife she was.

The group entered the center of town and all work in the shops ceased. One of the rougher boys of Stillbrook stared at the gyrating group and commented penetratingly, "Oh, boy. Dead drunk," and Bert Willington's happy face turned the color of American Beauty roses.

Then Adam Starling, editor of the Stillbrook Weekly Sentinel, at last called out from the crowd the question uppermost in everyone's mind:

"What in thunderation's got into you people?"

"Getting rid of the judge's elves," Doctor Gates panted, "for good and all!"

And the howling and hopping, directed by the doctor, continued right around to the station, where the little two-coach train stood getting up steam.

"Four elves for Boston," Bill announced to the conductor. "Only little fellows, so they can go half fare." He handed nothing into the conductor's palm, and the three men and the woman scrambled up the coach steps, shooed in the invisible elves, and slammed the door. Then they waved reassuringly at the judge's window, which was

Time Cannot Claim This Hour

By Kathleen O'Neill-Bailey

Within your arms both rest and rapture lie
Where love, a living flame, can yet bestow
The gift of peace so deep my heart must know
It has come home, at last, to live—or die.
Time cannot claim this hour, nor life deny
Its dear contentment, nor the shadows grow Around its loveliness. . . . For all we owe Eternity alone can satisfy.

Remember that you bear me where you will,
Who have known happiness beyond belief,
If our swift-parted ways should meet no more.
The years ahead may never here fulfill
Our finite dreams—but do not shelter grief:
I shall be waiting on the tideless shore.

visible at the top of the town, while the conductor stood by as though in a trance.

But at that moment Mrs. Hopper, the judge's housekeeper, quite out of breath, broke through the crowd of onlookers and cried:

"Their satchels! The elves left their satchels behind. Judge wants you to come back and get 'em—he's afraid the elves will return for them!"

They groaned in unison, but Bill Gates asked them, "Is it worth it, or isn't it?" and the crowd held its breath.

"I'll hold up the train," Sheriff Wakefield offered.

"We'll help you, doc," several onlookers spoke up.

So the group of four turned back up Main Street, but this time the crowd went with them. And thus the whole town set to, to help Doctor Gates make his psychological treatment a success. They streamed up the street, men, women and children, and when the satchels had been reclaimed they streamed down it once more, shouting and singing. And after the flabbergasted engineer had at last been permitted to start the train and it chugged away, the multitude gathered about and gave three deafening cheers. Doctor Gates, discovering that the cheers were for him, blushed furiously, but he was proud, for he knew he had proved himself, and warmly happy, too, for now, as Mary had said, they were all human beings together.

The judge's big white house rocked with revelry that Christmas Eve. All the hearth fires were lighted against the snow and cold, and the cider flowed freely. Once Mary Gates' eyes had filled with tears, perhaps at the sight of her beautiful cake being borne in all alight with ninety candles, or perhaps at the sight of the Santa Claus who proudly bore it.

The judge laughed and cried and even did a few steps of the Portland Fancy with Mabel Badger, to the music of the trio which had set up in the hall.

Once during the festivities he approached Santa Claus and said, "Boy, I think I'm having hallucinations again."

Santa's false beard dropped a good four inches. "What do you mean, your honor?" Bill gasped.

"Well, I heard Christmas music, singing and the like," the judge told him, "early this evening."

"But folks were singing carols outside your window. You must have heard them."

"How could I?" The judge's blue eyes twinkled gaily. "Been deaf for twenty years." He skipped merrily away.

Bringing up Parents

DR. BARBARA BIBER, Consultant
Child Psychologist, Bank Street Schools, New York

THE six-year-old boy, getting dressed, said, "Gee, mother, I think my feet are on wrong." His mother said, "Yes, dear, you did put your shoes on the wrong feet." She was very wise. She might have laughed at him—in fact, it was hard not to. But this mother was aware of how easily children's feelings may be hurt by adults who laugh at them when they have no intention of being funny. Every parent wants his children to be close, to enjoy being with him, to come with their problems. But sometimes the best of parents adopt careless attitudes in what seems to them to be an unimportant aspect of living with children. A child who gets a disturbing feeling that he may be laughed at, in the serious business of growing up, can be driven away from a closer relationship with his parents. That doesn't mean you shouldn't laugh with your child; it does mean you should be aware of when he's serious and meet him at his own level.

His skin actually thinner and more sensitive, you know, than a grown-o's. Recent tests show that it would be hurt and injured oner. He trusts you to give his delicate skin your ery gentlest care.

Even during your busiest hours you find time to change him, to keep that tender skin dry and comfy. If your baby is under 6 months, try lining his diapers with 20 or more fluffed up sheets of soft, absorbent ScotTissue. You won't have so many complete diaper changes. Just remove and flush away soiled tissue. It saves laundry and keeps baby just as dry.

TRAINING-TABLE DIET

For Feminine Figure Champions

Prize-winning figure proportions include a waist which measures ten inches less than your bust and hips, which should be the same. While these measurements are the exception (usually discovered by talent scouts), they can be your goal for getting your figure in shape for your new fall clothes. The Training-Table Diet, high in nutrition but low in calories, is designed to show you the way. If you are within fractions of the ideal measurements, one or two weeks' diet will do the trick. If, however, you are definitely overweight—and your doctor agrees—determine the number of pounds you must lose to feel your best and look your prettiest. Divide the number by two and follow the diet for that number of weeks. For example, if you should lose ten pounds, you will have to diet for five weeks. For perfect results: avoid the extras (see Hidden Calories) which are tempting but apt to find you "eating your way out of the league"! ★

LADIES, HERE IS THE KEY TO HIS HEART!

companion. He seems to understand and sympathize, but may see only the outward facts and miss the inner significances, for his own emotions can remain singularly untouched and uninvolved. He is faithful and loyal, but none too good at caresses, and seems half-afraid of his own passional depths. For he loves life, yet love is not the greatest thing in life to Dick; his work is. He should be a success, for he has an easy magnetism, is clever and resourceful, and carries things off with magnificent self-possession.

Key. Dick expresses himself better in words than emotions, so he needs to talk things out often. Be a good listener and always give him facts. He appreciates brains and ingenuity when you are not militant or aggressive—he likes feminine women. But don't try to win him over by being sick, as he can't abide sickness or weakness. Fit into as many of his varied interests as you can, but let him take the initiative, especially in loving. Be vitally responsive then and help him merge himself more fully. He is charming to many women, but he resents their disturbing his emotions, for Dick is not oversexed, for all his sex appeal, nor easily promiscuous. He measures everything by his own yardstick of standards, and hates to be questioned or probed. His moods are unexpected and sharply jagged, but of brief duration, and life with Dick will never be dull.

HARRY 42

HARRY is an artist and something of a musician. He has a delicate sense of taste that loves harmony and color, beauty and rhythm. Always courteous and gracious in manner, he has a go-withness about him that makes him seem pliable and adaptable in the extreme. But for all his tact and responsiveness, Harry has a one-track mind that remains secretly set more than most people guess. He finds it hard to balance thought with feeling, which makes him the victim of either-or thinking, the kind that ponders and weighs, measures and considers and cannot easily reach a decision.

Harry is quietly fervent and sincere, given to high ideals and devotion to family, church and worthy causes. He strives so hard to please others that he often fails to please himself, but anger with Harry is more melancholy than fury. He craves refinement and culture, for he is a perfectionist who retreats from discord as from a physical injury. He finds reality hard to face, becomes upset by harsh and crude surroundings, and will do almost anything for the sake of peace. He would be poor at politics, or in competition with ruthless businessmen, for he lacks endurance and aggressiveness, but his nature is open and forceful in his world of artistry and music.

Harry's wife finds him gentle and understanding, a comforting, comfortable person to have around the house. He is malleable and easily swayed in the little matters that mean so much to a wife, even though he is sweetly adept at getting his own way when he wants it. Though something of a mystic, he becomes very human in love and quite demonstrative, yet in a curious and subtle way he keeps his inmost self aloof. It is as if his world of dreams and illusions were as real as the real one of tumult and passion.

Key. Harry can't bear to hurt anyone, nor to be hurt himself. It kills his spirit, and half of Harry is his high, fine spirit. He is an honest-to-goodness romanticist, ever seeking for ideal relationships and idyllic love. This inclines him to put people on pedestals, especially one he loves, and when she falls short he suffers; or if a relationship becomes tumultuous he crawls off in a shell of melancholy. This is because he is both superemotional and hypersensitive, and he has an inner core of vanity that easily takes on feelings of inferiority in place of the feelings of superiority he must have to be at his best. Also to be his best he must be in love and be dear loved, for he then receives the sustainme and adulation he needs and craves. Har may never set the world on fire, but he mak an ideal husband.

BEN is a government official. He is self-possessed, dignified man, reserved an correct in manner. He looks older than h years because of his sedate and serious mie yet underneath his somber, courageous e terior he hides a lot of timidity and caution He loves to rule and superintend, keeps h finger in many pies, and with his gift fo organization and facts he generally succeed in his purposes. He has a strong will doggedly controls his temper, and with quie determination dominates everything an everybody he can.

Proud and ambitious, Ben craves cultur and position, and is giving a good account o himself in his field. Yet he is a constan mixer who never quite mixes or mingles wit those he associates with. He is too auster and autocratic, too critical and exacting. H almost never explodes; he seldom argues o bickers. But he makes others feel that they are out of step with him, not that he is out of step with them, and in the end others usually step out of his path. He is cunning and clever and must win at every game to be happy, even the game o love.

> Honor's not well lost for anything. You can't replace it. —A. S. M. HUTCHINSON: If Winter Comes (Little, Brown and Company).

Ben's wife finds him to be a solemnly devoted husband and father, who loves authority. He is intense and serious in love, yet he secretly fights responding to others even though he loves having them respond to him. He loves attention and gives it, and in an effort to hide his native arrogance he often makes sacrifices and exhibits great moral courage, but with a hint of the martyr in his make-up, and very little humor. He seldom lets himself go, no matter how angry he feels, but stalks away in silence. He inhibits his passion in the same way, making him moody and morose, but determined to be exemplary in conduct at all costs.

Key. Because fear and caution are forever tugging at Ben, he overcompensates by a show of fearlessness and strength. Being so somber and serious, he needs to learn to laugh more and broaden his sense of humor. This will also help him release the pent-up temper and passion which he controls so intensely outwardly but which ravage his inner nature. He has such a strong ego that he can't bear to lose his own sense of identity, not even in love, so he will try to dominate and submerge the personality of a loved one. For Ben is an amative person with a Puritan complex, and in spite of his independent self-assurance he is at heart a truly lonely man, eager, but afraid, to give and receive love fully and freely. You will have to be willing to play second fiddle as Ben's wife, but many will respect, and even envy, your position.

BILL 21

BILL is a doctor. He is capable of high sacrifice, for there is something open and big about him: big-visioned, bighearted. His response to people and their needs is generous and royal, but there is a touch of reticence in his speech and manner, and in spite of his lovingness he does not express his feelings easily. Naturally radiant, he hates gloom and loves joy, and many patients are cured more by his cheerful confidence than by his medicine.

Bill hates littleness, cheapness, puny purposes; he has innate pride and high aims. There is something almost tragic in the way he can feel into the hearts of others, for it makes him suffer everybody's woes. He has more power and compassion than brilliance, for he thinks with his emotions—a sort of honest dramatizer of himself. He believes in the goodness of mankind and with humble pride and simple vanity he adores his own integrity. He is democratic and gives with lavish generosity, yet he lives in a kingdom of his own making and reaches down to you from his throne, but not condescendingly. When faith in someone topples he becomes deeply despondent, but Bill can lift himself up by his own bootstraps.

His wife finds him sweetly intriguing and fun to be with—but he is always at the beck and call of humanity. He likes to nurture and cherish and feels possessive of loved ones, though he may not show it. He is more loving than passionate, and is fundamentally stable and loyal. He seldom stoops, never grovels. He wants everything to come out perfectly, but he hates details, and cannot bear to be censored. He feels despair or anxiety more than anger, and when things go wrong Bill is prone to feel that life is punishing him.

Key. Bill's impulsive, may even seem erratic and gullible at times. He is overgenerous, extremely proud, and tenderhearted. He has a way with him—a sense of chivalry and a princely gallantry—that is appealing to women. But give him plenty of praise and plenty of rope and he will only tie tighter the knot that binds him to you, if he loves you. He is supersensitive to unfriendliness and criticism, and a word or glance can throw him into gloom. His moods are sudden and swiftly changeable, but the sunshine predominates. Bill likes familiar things: a certain chair, his own walls, his loved ones. He expects you to believe in his good intentions and not censure or dictate. All in all, he is a considerate and thoughtful person, a good lover, a loyal husband.

JIM is a merchant, economical and conservative, and a worker in civic causes. He is also a home-loving family man who has a warm responsiveness to daily living. He lives in the here and now, with real interest in the come and go of events. Though friendly and sociable, he is not given to much talking, but he is quietly sympathetic and remembers what he feels. Inwardly he feels timid and cautious, so he likes to consider all facts before making a decision. He likes to touch things, to handle them in his thinking; this gives him the feeling of security he craves.

Jim is none too aggressive and dynamic, but is a prudent merchant and a wise citizen who sets an impressive example by being a solid backer of good leaders. He meets most situations with passive poise and without upset, for he has inborn pride and dignity and feels a sure respect for himself and his decisions. He quickly feels pity for others, and sometimes directs it toward himself. He is seldom explosive or bad-tempered, but has gradual, mellow moods of dejection and elation. He generally wears a mantle of gentleness and releases his temper in little ways, such as nervous irritability over trifles that bother him just for the moment and only on the surface.

Jim's wife finds him a thoughtful housemate and a pleasing companion. He is romantically affectionate and giving in love. But his demonstrations are so laborious that they have a tendency to smother, and if rebuffed he may give in to illness. He is frugal and expects her to be thrifty; good at routine and requires that she be systematic. He has great family pride and much sentiment—a sort of idealistic realist who is capable of critically evaluating others without observing the same faults in his own make-up.

Key. Jim is given to dramatizing himself in secret and remembers well every little thing you say or do. No one is more truly a home-loving domestic man than Jim, none more yielding as a husband and lover. He craves being loved and cherished and clings tenaciously to a dear one in an effort to gain security in love, for in all things he longs to feel secure. He does not require you to play second fiddle, but he captivates and holds a person captive by his very submissiveness and devotion. Underneath his pride and quiet arrogance he feels doubt and self-abasement, and if he should fail or disappoint you he would tell you he is no good, and with a look of strange pride dare you to believe him. Don't do it, for Jim is as big as your belief in him, and your love.

PETE 34

PETE is a real-estate man, a little-theater actor turned agent. He is a merry, charming fellow, a good conversationalist and an easy mixer. There is a fluid, chameleonlike quality about him that makes him belong to whatever setting he is in, and he is singularly influenced by it and by the people around him, whom he in turn influences greatly. So most of Pete's troubles come from human relationships, but he gets moody from inner storms rather than angry.

Pete's native histrionic ability makes him an intriguing actor in the drama of life, for his thinking is a kind of feeling. He has a vivid imagination and a sensitive response to color, music, ideas. But for all his quick grace of motion he has to battle himself not to be a dreamer more than a doer, even though he lives in the present. So many impressions play upon him that he becomes mute with emotion, yet he can win by charm as much as by effort and manages to accomplish a great deal. He makes an excellent salesman, even though there is nothing hard or calculating about him, as he can so easily sell himself.

Pete's wife finds him a delightful companion, responsive to her least fancy when in his usually gay, tender mood. Considerate and unselfish, he seldom does or says things to offend, yet he has a way of graciously getting his own way. Indeed, Pete has a magic, special touch that makes doing anything with him seem glamorous and important. Luxury-loving and none too conventional, he has an inborn impulse to satisfy his own desires when upset. So he may compensate with drink or some form of indulgence if life gets too emotionally tragic, unless his refined side clings to his basically high ideals.

Nobody ever does his best; that is why we all have so good a chance to do better.

Key. It makes a big difference whom Pete marries, for if not given sympathetic understanding he may try to get even with life, and rather than take it out on people he would take it out on himself. He has much of the sweet little boy about him which makes him appealing and lovable; he will even take advice and criticism if given in the spirit of love. He has a poetic sense and a reproductive imagination which makes him creative, but he is at his best as a realist. He needs to be helped to face facts squarely and encouraged to use his native ability in both practical and creative endeavor. Humanitarian and domestic, he loves to serve and be served by loved ones, and he needs to give some of himself in service to mankind. He is a sensuous, not a sensual lover, susceptible to every touch and tone.

SAM 31

SAM is an engineer and builder, keen and courageous, outspoken and brusque. He is a proud man and secretly vain, with a sort of regal dignity in his bearing and strong physical magnetism. His penetrating mind and alert face are always watching and searching, taking in everything with eagle eye, for he has an insatiable hunger to know, to experience, to gain his own ends. Full of nervous energy, strong of will and purpose, he loves to master obstacles. Competition only spurs him on and he hates to come out second in anything he undertakes.

So Sam is a natural leader, loving prestige and position, and having a cautious daring few possess. He fights anxiety and inner fear, but this very fact impels him to greater courage and he has the capacity for disciplining himself as well as controlling others, if he does not let his lower nature sidetrack him. For Sam greatly enjoys the pleasures of the senses: food, drink, luxury, sex. He is always up on the heights or down in the depths, but none is better at hiding his feelings and intentions, more gifted with concentration and determination.

Sam's wife finds him grand company when in an agreeable mood, with a keen faculty for listening and understanding that is satisfying and rewarding. He is usually serious, even at play, and his permeative presence is always felt even when he says nothing. He is unpredictable, full of surprises, and when angered he may lash out with sarcasm or silently brood. He is an intense, dominating lover and is never calm even when he seems to be, for his mind is ever probing and temperamental storms are often brewing within. He loves by mastering, not by yielding, and is always the ruler in his home.

Key. Sam's compulsive drive may be his power or his undoing. He will be staunchly loyal and devoted to the right wife and she can help him conquer himself even as he conquers other things. Unless you are physically strong and passionate, Sam is not for you, as he is so highly sexed he finds the more chaste and tender forms of love difficult to achieve, and he may have to fight varietism. He keeps his own counsel with a sort of brooding relentlessness, but he is capable of revenge and is also of a jealous disposition. He needs a peaceful, well-ordered home and a wife who knows how to feed his ego constantly. He must be the master always, but he is so magnetic and forceful that one on whom he showers attention feels important and flattered. And he can practically remove mountains if his faculties are given full expression and guided into constructive channels.

JACK is a professor; he also grows flowers, does woodwork, writes and gives lectures. For Jack is a versatile, jack-of-many-interests person who may be immersed in using his brain one day and absorbed in a practical skill the next, equally happy and gifted at both. He is spontaneously friendly and good-humored; his alert senses and quick, light touch keep him on the qui vive, a dynamic live wire who gives off sparks of magnetism. But he is outwardly responsive and inwardly elusive, making him difficult to really know. He has a meditative, self-sufficient side that sets him apart and propels him to action.

Energetic and fearless, he has a compulsive idea of what is worth while in life and of doing it with poise and self-confidence. He is also original and intuitive—a truly creative person. But under his cool head are hypersensitive emotions, which he inhibits with great intensity. He constantly stores up impressions, mulls things over, carries on a stream-of-consciousness thinking that he seldom voices. Yet such is the pose of self-possession that few ever guess how the caldron boils within—not of anger, but emotion. Essentially unteachable, he is always learning; extremely adaptable, he ever fights to maintain an independence that even love cannot conquer.

Jack's wife finds him both trusting and trustworthy, loving the truth and hating deception. He loves life and gives her life color and meaning; he hates harshness and crudeness. He is quick to accept responsibility, and likes to lay all his cards on the table in an effort to understand and be understood. Tenderminded yet earthy, he strives for a physical-mystical union in marriage, but even when greatly loved he feels unloved and rejected at times and with strange self-doubt he quietly hates himself.

Key. Jack is a coolheaded, warmhearted hustler who will always make a good living. He is fascinating to many women, so he finds surface contacts easy, but not lasting love. For he does not love lightly, and he wants to feel anchored without loss of independence. He isn't easy to change or easy to understand, for he stumbles over his own emotions and is often at war within. He can't give himself in love if there is a feeling of domination or suspicion, for he isn't revengeful or jealous and finds this hard to understand in others. He sticks to a bargain once it is made, and is slow to reveal any hurts to his heart or pride. He seldom gets angry or blue, but gives way to inner fury at times due to inner conflict. Yet Jack is capable of an unusually satisfying intimacy in love, if he is well integrated.

cern and longs to ease all the sorrows of the world. He is sociable and adaptable, his perceptions are keen but kind, he co-operates easily and seldom gets ruffled or upset. But being so sensitive to the play and interplay of living upon lives, and so timid and cautious by nature, he finds it hard to make up his mind, difficult to follow up feeling with action and live boldly. And for all his sympathetic responsiveness to everyone's troubles, he manages somehow to remain curiously unstirred and unhurt in a personal sense.

This is because Joe is a visionary, a peace-loving idealist who uses up his emotion on philosophic theory and humanitarian speculation. He sees and plans so much to do, so many to help and reform that he often gets lost and bewildered in the maze of details and duties. But he gives of himself with wholehearted generosity, never seeking position or glory, and never posing. He is the first to excuse others and the last to condemn. He is always seeking the truth and cares little for the conventions.

His wife finds Joe to be sentimentally tender and romantic, and ever solicitous of her welfare. He is tranquil and easygoing, with an easy-to-live-with disposition. He seems to flow with her in thought and feeling, seldom gives in to storms of anger or passion, and is quite free of jealousy or revenge. Never cowardly but troubled with uncertainty always, Joe did not easily decide to marry, but none makes a more affectionate and companionable husband. Democratic and singularly human, he lives with his head in the clouds and his hands busy with things of the earth, his life dedicated to others.

Key. Joe has a mild, sweet-tempered disposition that may be irritating at times when one wants to clear the air with an exchange of words or action, or when one wants him to make up his mind and he won't or cannot. But his kind, refined nature is incapable of the more barbaric emotions and he loves with delicacy and taste. He responds to love easily but not intensely, and for this reason finds it hard to make up his mind about marriage and likewise difficult to find happiness. He hates to lose his intellectual independence, but once he makes up his mind, he will endure even an unhappy relation with more serenity and adaptation than most men could muster. If demanding and passionate by nature, do not marry Joe; he would feel trapped and so would you. But his wife can help him overcome inner fear and caution, and the resulting indecision.

Children need the 6-way nourishment from ENRICHED BREAD and FLOUR

There's such a delicious variety of breads . . . at the stores . . . or that you can make. Use more of them to vary your menus.

You knew, of course, that bread is our cheapest and best source of food energy, providing power for the laboring man, "go" for children . . . energy to sustain us all in our stepped-up pace of living.

But those flags . . . have you read what they say? From modern enriched bread and baked foods made with enriched flour you get 6-way nourishment! A valuable contribution toward the all-round balanced diet you need. Remember that . . . every day at meal time, at snack time.

"IS BREAD FATTENING?" No; nutritionists tell us breads are no more fattening than any other food of equal energy content. The carbohydrates of bread are readily and easily converted into energy which is then used by the body as needed.

WHEAT FLOUR INSTITUTE

"HOT FROM THE OVEN" come your own biscuits, muffins, cakes, cookies, pies to thrill your family and guests. Always buy flour that says "Enriched" on the label. Make sure it has this added nourishment.

WHAT TEMPTING VARIETY your baker offers! New treats in breads, rolls, cookies! And they're all highly nutritious when enriched. Ask him. It's important that you know.

ALWAYS SERVE PLENTY OF BREAD It's delicious and so economical. On the wrappers of enriched white bread there's a panel stating that fact. Look for it when you shop.

oong ha peen, and what a combination of delectable tastes and textures this dish provides! With it, we'll serve green-pepper-fried rice.

As a gesture in the direction of dessert—an American touch, because the Chinese don't serve dessert in our sense of the word—an assortment of preserved fruits will give the perfect finale to a super meal. At least I think it's super, and I hope you'll agree.

The recipes will serve eight, and this can be a sit-down dinner from start to finish; the whole meal can be served buffet; or the first half can be served in the living room, and the second in the dining room.

BARBECUED SPARERIBS

Get a strip of meaty, lean spareribs and put it in a pan with a very little water. I use my oval or oblong roaster for this so that the spareribs can lie flat. Cover and cook gently on top of range until tender enough that the bones can be pulled out. From time to time add just enough water to prevent browning. When cool enough to handle, remove bones—they slip out easily. Cut meat into strips or squares, as neat as possible; 1-inch square of 2 ribs or 1½-to-2-inch strip of 1 rib is about right in size.

Make a barbecue sauce of ⅓ cup soya sauce, 5 tablespoons light brown sugar, 1 tablespoon cornstarch, 2 tablespoons vinegar, 3 tablespoons finely chopped candied ginger and 1 clove garlic, minced. Dip each piece of spareribs into the sauce until completely coated and arrange on broiling pan. Set pan in about the middle of your oven, turn on broiler, and watch. When top sides of pieces are nicely browned, turn them over, dab on a little more sauce and brown other sides. Transfer to paper towels to drain off excess grease and store in a cold place. This is a good day-before job—and if you like the spareribs hot instead of cold, just heat them in the oven for a few minutes before serving.

There was a man who was greatly in the habit of exaggerating everything, and afterward feeling ashamed of having done so. So he said to his wife one evening when they were going out to a dinner party, "Tonight if you hear me exaggerating anything make a sign across the table and I'll stop it."

At dinner he got to boasting about the big conservatory they had at his home when he was a boy. "It was," he said, "let me see, oh, easily a hundred feet long and I should say about sixty feet high." At this moment he got the sign from his wife, checked himself and added very quietly, "But of course it was only about eighteen inches wide."

CHINESE MUSTARD

Make a thin paste of dry mustard, water and a very little tumeric. The tumeric adds a zesty flavor and a bright yellow color to the mustard.

PLUM SAUCE

This can be bought in Chinese stores or in food-specialty shops, and makes a delicious accompaniment to the barbecued spareribs. If you can't get it you can concoct a perfectly good substitute by mashing a few canned greengage plums and adding a little lemon juice and chopped candied ginger.

Butter chips make attractive dishes for the sauces, or individual small plates can be served with the spareribs so that the two sauces can be put on the plate and the pieces of meat dipped into them.

WUN TON SOUP

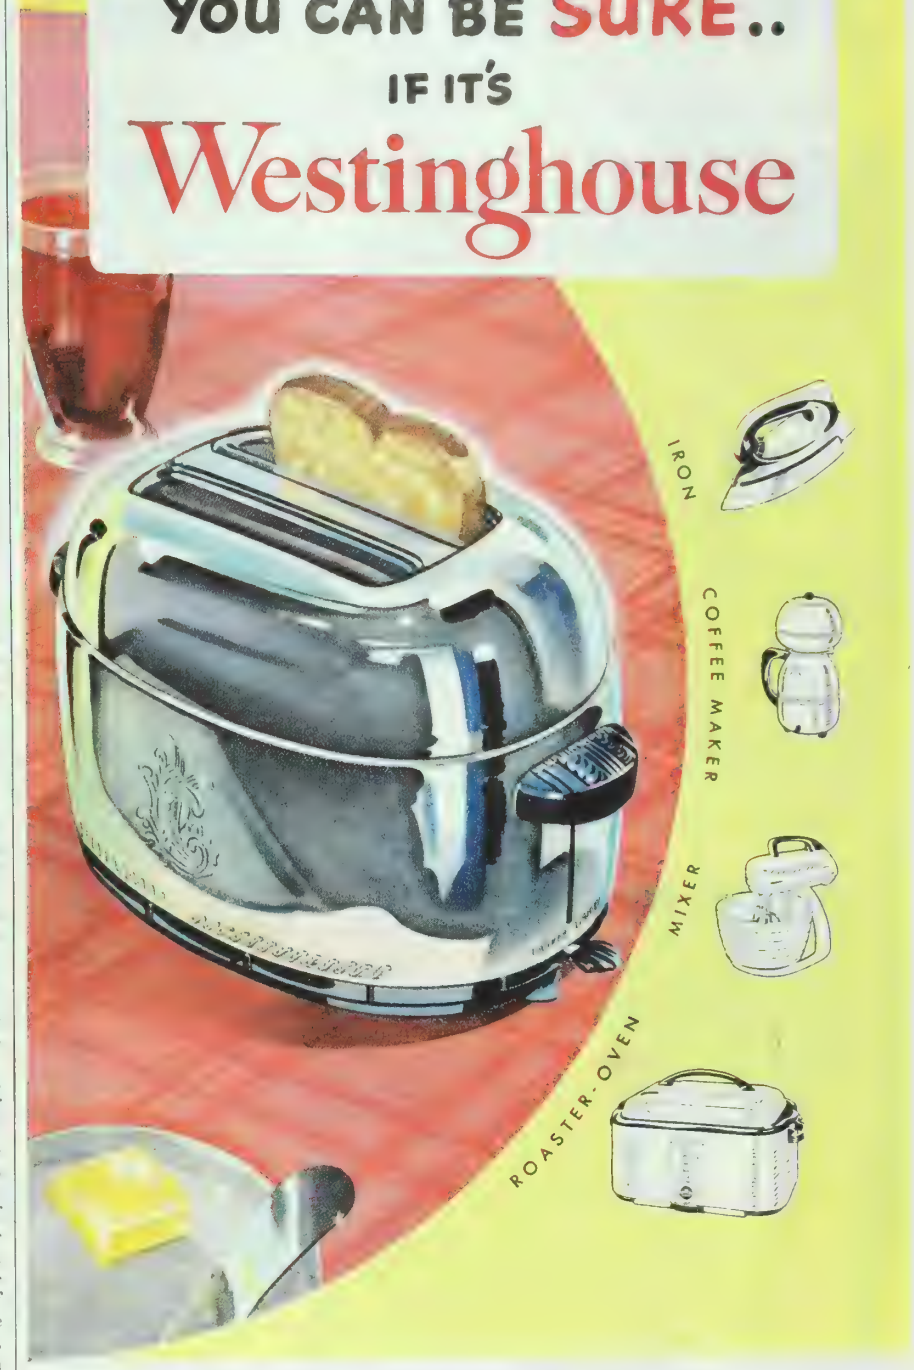
A day or two in advance prepare the chicken broth which will be used for the soup and the loong ha peen. Get a big stewing chicken and 2 or 3 extra gizzards and livers. Put chicken, gizzards and heart in a kettle with 14 cups cold water and 1 teaspoon gourmet powder, bring to a boil, then lower heat and cook, covered, 1 hour. (Gourmet powder has been the subject of many inquiries, and it deserves a little explanation. It has a variety of names—"Peking powder" is one; more often than not, just "Chinese seasoning powder." The principal ingredient is a vegetable protein derivative, mono sodium glutinate. Gourmet powder intensifies, rather than adds to, the flavor of foods, so that your chicken soup tastes as if you had used two chickens instead of one to make it, and your steak tastes like the most superb beef imaginable. If your grocer doesn't have any one of these Chinese seasoning powders—look on the label for mono sodium glutinate as an ingredient—he can order it for you through a Chinese market, or an herb-and-condiment shop.) But back to the business at hand. Add 1½ teaspoons salt and continue cooking until chicken is tender. Take chicken from kettle and remove white meat from the breast in as large pieces as possible. Set these aside for your loong ha peen. Remove the rest of the chicken from the bones. We won't need it for this meal, but it can be used for croquettes, salad or creamed chicken, any day. Return bones to pot and cook some more so that all the chicken taste will go into the broth. Water should be added to compensate for evaporation, because we'll need 14 cups of broth in all. Add more seasoning if needed, strain through sieve lined with cheesecloth, cool and store in refrigerator, or outdoors if weather is cold enough. When grease rises to top, remove it.

To make stuffing for wun ton, sauté chicken livers in butter or margarine 2 minutes, transfer to chopping bowl or nut chopper and add the meaty parts of cooked gizzards—discard all gristle—4 water chestnuts cut into pieces, 1 small clove garlic, minced, 2 tablespoons chopped parsley, ½ teaspoon salt and a little freshly ground black pepper. If you were not successful in getting extra livers and gizzards, substitute some scraps of dark meat of chicken. Chop mixture very fine and, if needed, correct seasoning—¾ cup of stuffing will be plenty.

Make noodle dough by combining 2 slightly beaten eggs, ¼ cup water, 1 teaspoon salt and 2½ to 3 cups flour. Roll into very thin sheets—and be sure that your rolling pin and board are well floured or the stuff will stick. Cut rolled dough into 2½-inch squares, allowing 4 to 5 squares for each person to be served.

Make a ball of stuffing about the size of a smallish marble and put one in the center of each square, then brush outer edges of dough with slightly beaten egg. Now bring one point of a square to the center of a ball of stuffing. It will stick in place—the beaten egg attends to that. Then fasten the opposite point to the center in the same way, overlapping the first point of noodle dough slightly, and repeat the operation with the remaining two points. The result is a square of noodle dough with the ball of stuffing enclosed in the center. By gently pinching the four seams you can make the seal secure and the stuffing won't escape when the wun ton are boiled.

Make the wun ton the day before or the morning of the party. It's fun—at least I think it is—but it's a fairly fussy job, the only one we have with this meal, and it's well to have it out of the way ahead of time. An hour or two before serving, drop them into a pot of rapidly boiling salted water, lower heat and boil gently until tender—about 15 minutes. Drain and store in a cool place.



The rest of the prepreparation of the soup is simple. Cut ¼ pound sliced cold boiled ham into slender slivers, cut broccoli—Chinese or the regular kind—into slender strips to make 1 cup, chop tomatoes, skin and seeds removed, to make 1 cup and cut 8 or 10 scallions into thin slices, using some of the green tops.

For the actual assembly of the soup, have chicken broth boiling, add wun ton and ham, and when broth is again at boiling point, add broccoli and tomatoes. Cook 3 minutes more and the soup is ready to serve. The raw chopped scallions are sprinkled into each cup of soup according to taste—and for my taste this should be done with a very light touch. I can joyfully eat my way through a whole stack of scallions, but the taste of the soup is delicate and the onions shouldn't dominate it.

The preparations for making loong ha peen can be made in advance, but the cooking of it—which takes about 10 minutes—should

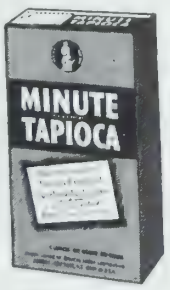
Smackin' good eating—APPLE RING TAPIOCA!



¼ cup Minute Tapioca
⅓ to ½ cup brown sugar, firmly packed
½ teaspoon salt
⅛ teaspoon mace
½ teaspoon cinnamon

Combine Minute Tapioca, ⅓ to ½ cup brown sugar, salt, spices, lemon juice, and water in saucepan and mix well. Bring to a full boil over medium heat, stirring constantly. Remove from heat.

Core unpeeled apples and cut in ¼-inch rings (makes about 10). Arrange half of rings in greased baking dish. Cover with tapioca mixture.

Add 3 tablespoons brown sugar to butter and mix well. Spread over tops of remaining apple rings. Arrange rings, sugar-side up, on tapioca mixture. be done just or shortly before serving. Later we'll go into ways and means of dodging a 10-minute session in the kitchen at an inconvenient time. Fresh, frozen or canned lobster may be used, and the quantity is a pretty elastic business. Most Chinese recipes call for a surprisingly small amount of meat, and I'm inclined to be a little generous in that department. I'll give you this recipe as I like it best, but if you want to cut down on the lobster and increase on the vegetables, you'll still have a wonderful dish.

Frozen lobster tails are available in many locker plants and groceries, and they're certainly easier to work with than a whole lobster, so I suggest you get them if possible—2½ pounds will be plenty. Wash them thoroughly in cold water and plunge them into a large pot of rapidly boiling water to which 1 cup vinegar has been added. Boil 8 minutes, rinse in cold water, remove shells and cut meat into fairly thin slices. If whole lobster is used, get 1 large or 2 small, boil 10 minutes, split in half, remove meat and slice. Two 7- or 8-ounce cans of lobster may be substituted, but try for fresh or frozen because of their firmness. Many stores don't stock lobster tails because their sale is uncertain or slow, but perhaps you could order in advance. I like to keep a little stock of them in my frozen-food locker. Not that I toss them around in lighthearted abandon—they're too expensive—but it gives me a feeling of providence to have them on hand for a possible emergency. Lobster Newburg; sweet and pungent lobster; salad—their uses are infinite.

Cut the cooked chicken breast into thin slices and mix them with the lobster.

Now we're ready for vegetables. I'll give you my first choice, but I'll suggest substitutes in case any of these are not available. Slice fresh or canned water chestnuts to make 2 cups. Cut 1 can bamboo shoots into thin slices. Wash and string, just as you would string a green bean, 1½ pounds snow peas (edible pea pods). Slice 1 pound firm fresh mushrooms—and don't make the slices too thin because, as you know, mushrooms decrease considerably in bulk as they cook.

Canned water chestnuts and bamboo shoots are available now in most fancy grocery stores and in Chinese markets. You shouldn't have much trouble in getting them, but if you do, substitute sliced flowerets of cauliflower and a handful of blanched almonds for the water chestnuts, and whole button mushrooms for the bamboo shoots. Snow peas I've never found anywhere except in a Chinese market, but I did grow them in our garden last summer with great success. I got the seeds in Chinatown, planted them very early in the spring, and I think every one of them came up. Now my frozen-food locker holds box after box, and do I love it! I couldn't find any directions for processing snow peas, so I had to make my own. I gave them only ½ minute in boiling water, transferred them to ice water until thoroughly chilled and proceeded as with any other vegetable. Of course the frozen ones take next to no cooking; by the time they're hot they're done. But to get back to substitutes. If you can't get edible pea pods, use 2 cups fresh shelled peas and 1 pound shredded Chinese cabbage (celery cabbage). The Chinese cabbage, if brought barely to the boiling point, will be crisp enough to pinch hit for the crispness of the edible pea pods. The texture of the vegetables is of supreme importance.

Break 1 cup walnut meats into small pieces—don't chop them—and fry in butter, margarine or salad oil until deep golden brown. Spread on paper towels to drain off grease. Chop 3 hard-cooked eggs very fine and heat before serving.

With all preparations made, the cooking of loong ha peen is no chore at all. Heat the 4 cups chicken broth to the boiling point and have all the other ingredients at hand. Heat 4 tablespoons peanut or other salad oil—not olive oil—and 2 finely minced cloves garlic in a heavy skillet. When sizzling hot add chicken, lobster, water chestnuts, bamboo shoots and mushrooms. Cook 2 minutes, stirring all the time, and transfer contents of skillet to a pot or large casserole that will stand direct heat. Put it over heat, add hot chicken broth, 1½ teaspoons salt, 2 teaspoons gourmet powder and 1 teaspoon sugar, cover and cook

4 minutes. Add edible pea pods, cover and cook 1 minute more. Stir in 8 teaspoons cornstarch mixed to a smooth paste with water, cook 2 minutes more, stirring frequently—and that's all. If ordinary peas and Chinese cabbage are substituted for the edible pea pods, start the peas cooking with the meat and add the Chinese cabbage at the last so that it will barely come to the boiling point.

Serve the loong ha peen in the casserole in which it was cooked or in a chafing dish, and have the nuts and chopped egg in small bowls beside it.

GREEN-PEPPER-FRIED RICE

The rice should be boiled the day before, and it can be fried at the last convenient moment before guests arrive and kept hot in a very low oven or warming oven or on an electric hot plate. That's fine and easy. Boil 2 well-washed cups long-grained rice—or cook it by any method you like best—drain, spread on cooky sheet and let it dry for a few minutes in a barely turned-on oven. Store in a cold place. Chop coarsely 4 green peppers, 2 medium onions and 2 canned pimientos.

To fry the rice, beat 2 eggs with ¼ cup water and scramble them in a hot, well-greased skillet until half done. Add onions, green peppers, pimientos, rice, 1 teaspoon gourmet powder and 6 teaspoons soya sauce. Stir until well mixed and cook 5 minutes, occasionally turning rice over with a pancake turner. Taste and add more soya sauce if needed. Transfer to dish in which it is to be served, and keep hot.

PRESERVED FRUIT

Here the choice of fruits is up to you, and whether they are home-preserved or bought ready for the table is also your choice. You won't need a large quantity of any one fruit, but I think a wide variety is desirable. Kumquats, figs, cherries, mint-flavored pears colored green, apricots and so on are all good and provide a fine variety of color. A few sticks of candied orange and grapefruit peel would be a nice addition, or some honey-cooked nuts; and if you want to go a step farther, add some almond and fortune cookies, which can be bought in Chinese markets, or some thin, crisp, homemade cookies. Appetites will already be satisfied, and a touch of sweets is all we need as a piquant finale to our dinner.

The whole meal can be served buffet, with individual trays, plenty of small tables strategically located, or card tables set up for the convenience of your guests—and yourself. Whenever I plan a buffet meal, or suggest that kind of service, comfort looms large in my calculations. I don't care how supercolossal the food may be, a dinner can be ruined if eating it turns into a juggling act.

If you decide on eating at the dining table, I'd suggest serving the barbecued spareribs in the living room and everything else in the dining room. The preserved fruit needn't be a separate course. It can be on the table looking very decorative with a stack of plates beside it, waiting until everyone has had his fill of the hot food.

I find it easy and pleasant to split this meal differently and serve both the soup and the barbecued spareribs in the living room. And if you have a chafing dish or other heating gadget, it's fun to do the final cooking of the soup there too. The platter of precooked wun ton and the bowls of ham, broccoli, tomatoes and scallions are so colorful, and if the broth is brought in piping hot, only a few minutes are needed to have the soup ready to serve.

The only problem is the final cooking of loong ha peen, which must not under any circumstances be overcooked. Unless you plan to absent yourself and do this dish literally at the last moment it must be done as late as possible and placed in or on a heating device which will keep it piping hot but not continue to cook it. My solution of this problem is an electric hot plate with a cover; but lacking one of these most useful gadgets, a warming oven or a preheated but turned-off oven will do.

This meal at Anna May's had a happy aftermath. Richard Wong, Anna May's college-student brother, was so fascinated by the preparations—he could not believe at first that I would actually cook the dishes instead of ordering them from a Chinese chef—that he offered to cook me an un-American Chinese dinner himself. And a superb meal it was too. The chef-d'oeuvre was a winter-melon soup, served in the huge melon which stood in the center of the table throughout the meal. It is the Chinese custom to take up a morsel of food with one's chopsticks from time to time and dip it in the soup before eating it. Instructed by Anna May, my husband soon became quite expert at this, but on my first attempt my morsel disappeared in the soup and I gave up. It was a gay party and a delectable menu, and my respect for the gracious civilization of China rose even higher than before. I hope my menu will convey some of this feeling to you and your guests. THE END

"Well, what do you think?" she said, coming back out. "What do you honestly think?"

Now mother should have known better than to put "honest" in it. Father never takes it lightly when someone asks him what he honestly thinks.

He looked at mother very carefully. He went around and looked at the back. Finally he said, "It hardens the lines in your face."

Mother took off the hat and threw it. It went on the Welsh dresser. My little brother, Pud, picked it up and smoothed out this pinkish brownish feather that was on it, like he felt sorry for the hat.

Mother said, "Well! The hat cost a pretty penny, but I'll certainly never wear it." Then she said, "Is the water hot for tea?" like she had forgotten about the whole thing.

Father started to read his book again. I guess he thought she had.

But mother glared at him a minute. And then she said, "Well, say something!"

"I did," father said, looking up from his book. "Too much, I guess. I didn't know you wanted pretty lies."

"You've just wrecked a whole season for me and you don't even care," mother said.

Father said, "It's a pretty enough hat. It just doesn't go with your face. They ought to sell hats that go with faces."

"Well, that helps, I'm sure," mother said. "I liked it better when you just kept still."

"You're a good-looking woman," father said, getting up and picking up the hat. "And this is a very pretty hat, but I don't like it on you. Couldn't you just carry it?"

"That," mother said, "is the kind of question nobody answers." She whisked the hat out of father's hand and put it back in the box. She put the tissue paper back on top of it and put the lid on. "Come on and have some tea," she said. "I suppose you can't help having to tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but."

Mother wore the hat, though. She wore it several times. But every time she did she fussed around a lot about how she had it on and she wasn't happy about it. And "I hate this coat," she said, time after time. "I should have put the money toward a coat."

"I think the hat is real pretty," I told her and she said:

"Yeah, so does father. I was crazy, I guess. What I really need is a new vacuum cleaner, and I sink that kind of money in a hat."

She was still wearing the hat and talking that way about it when this girl came to visit Aunt Lil. She isn't our aunt, she's mother's aunt, and mother's cousin, Dorothy, lives with her and this girl came there to stay for a long time because she was going to go to some kind of a school and Aunt Lil has an extra room and the girl's mother was an old friend of hers.

"I want to go over to Aunt Lil's tonight," mother said one night. "I can hardly wait to see Rita. I've heard so much about her. So I baked some brownies."

"What?" father said.

"Hurry with dinner," mother said. "We'll all go. The baby too."

"I hope Rita comes often, if she makes you bake brownies," father said.

"They're for Aunt Lil," mother said. "I have to have an excuse for going."

"Couldn't you just go to see Rita?" father said.

"Of course not," mother said. "It would look nosy. Aunt Lil loves brownies."

"It doesn't hardly seem right," father said. "Carrying brownies to Aunt Lil just so we can all gawk at Rita."

"I suppose it wouldn't to you," mother said. "It has such a dishonest flavor."

Well, this Rita was very special. I thought she was going to be as old as mother and Dorothy, but she wasn't; she was just a young girl, and was she somepn? It wasn't only that her eyes were the bluest I've ever seen and her hair was light and kind of silky and shining and her face had everything just exactly right and her forehead was wide and kind of shining, too, and she was slim, and wore nice clothes, but she was even nice. She smiled nice and she talked kind of like everything was so wonderful she could hardly get her breath.

Never chase a lie. Let it alone and it will run itself to death. I can work out a good character much faster than anyone can lie me out of it. —LYMAN BEECHER.

"Well, what did you think of Rita?" mother said afterward, when we were home and trying to get the blankets off the baby and him so asleep he just fell every which way when you moved him.

Father whistled. "Wheee-wheeeyou! The gorgeous stuff Aunt Lil's old friends turn out," he said.

"She is pretty, isn't she?" mother said.

"She IS," father said. "I don't think I've ever seen any one girl have so much of everything. Her hair and her eyes and her complexion and her figure and even her voice!"

"I didn't ask for an inventory," mother said.

But father didn't notice what she said. He had stopped unbundling the baby and he was folding up this blanket very carefully and smoothing it out and thinking of something else.

"Now that's the kind of face I mean," he said, "to go under that hat of yours with the name. Her face is soft and the hat wouldn't have that effect on her."

"Get to bed, boys!" mother said. "And don't skip the toothbrush!"

I was finishing the funnies.

"I mean now," she said, picking up the sleeping baby and starting upstairs with him, and she sounded cross. She stopped on the stairs and turned around. "I suppose I might give Rita the hat," she said.

Father didn't answer.

"But then she might not take castoffs," mother said, "and I might not be able to afford another. I just guess people will have to stand it on me."

"I really think," father said, "the more I think about it, I really think that hat was made for her. It belongs with her. It would be an artistic act to put it on her. You know this "party meal" serves four hungry people for only $1.87

You've always known the economy o canned foods in normal times. Nation-wid research by 19 universities* now proves that' true even in these days of high prices. Th facts boil down to this: Penny for penny canned foods in general give you more foo for your money, as well as more nutritiona values. Most foods in cans not only cost les than the same foods in other types of con tainers, but less even than the fresh foods– and far less than frozen foods.

On top of that, canned foods make wing of your apron strings! Their wide vari ety, their constant availability, and thei quick convenience make you a menu master minder instead of a meal-time drudge! And as for flavor and nutrition, remember each steel-and-tin can is really a miniature "pres sure cooker" that seals in fine flavors and precious nutrients.

The big reason why canned foods give you so much more and cost you so much less is—the can itself. Cans are sturdy, depend able, safe. And they're so inexpensive tha more of your money goes for what's in the can! Thank your lucky stars for this modern container!

We could get her over and have her on and if it's what I think it would be, r to let me take her picture."

her is a camera fan and he stood there moothing the blankets the baby had wrapped in with that faraway look in es. He was seeing the beautiful picture uld make. Mother was standing on the ooking at him, a look father might not liked if he had noticed it.

h, goody!" mother said through her "Let's!" And she went on upstairs.

was maybe two weeks later that mother unt Lil over for dinner. And Dorothy ita, too, of course.

unt Lil's so wonderful to me," she said. ink we ought to have them."

ou don't have to think up reasons," r said. "Sure, let's have them. And e Rita will let me take her picture."

Maybe she will!" mother said.

ta was even prettier than the first time. air shone like something that was silk!

ter dinner father "Would you like e some pictures been making?" d Aunt Lil said, course we would, ," and I knew father was get- around to.

e showed them ures he had just shed mounting. Aunt Lil said, u certainly have e nice ones there," Dorothy said to , "You know, he xhibited in many s," and Rita said, ey're just beauti- and father said, ll, I enjoy it. n I see some- g pretty, I like to ograph it. You w," he said to Rita lenly, "I'd like to tograph you, etime."

Well, thank you," said.

How about now?" er said. "I'm all up in the base- t."

Why, all right, I ss," Rita said. She ed to mother. "If don't mind."

Should I mind?" mother said.

There's this hat," father said, and mother t out to tend to something in the kitchen. s a very charming hat and I think it ld be rather special on you. Would you it on?"

ita shrugged. "Well, sure," she said.

ather called to mother and she came k into the room. "Rita says she'll wear hat," father said.

How nice!" mother said.

Well, get it, will you?" father said.

OTHER stood very very still like she wasn't n breathing and she said, "I'm so very y, but it isn't here," and she kept looking ita all the time, not at father.

Isn't here?" father said. "You couldn't e it back, you wore it."

Oh, no," mother said. "I didn't take it k. The feather came loose and I took it m to have them tack it on."

A little thing like that. You couldn't sew n yourself?" father said.

Huh-um," mother said, shaking her head looking kind of like a baby.

Well, father took the pictures and they all t home early because Aunt Lil doesn't to stay out late and I was going to bed father was helping Pud while mother ded to the baby and he went in the linen et to get a clean towel and all of a sudden yelled.

Hey! Here's your hat!"

So Pud and I both ran to look and sure enough there it was on the shelf. Father picked up the hatbox and looked inside. Then he picked out the hat and stood looking at it. Mother came and snatched it away from him.

"Oh, yes," she said, "I forgot. It did come back today."

"I don't believe it was ever gone," father said. "Was it?"

"You know," mother said, smiling sweetly, "it is very comfortable not to be bothered by the scruples some people have."

"IF you didn't want her to wear it, you could have said so," father said. "I wouldn't mind so much, but you might have kept it from the children."

"I'm sure I tried to," mother said.

Father looked very troubled. "Somehow I wouldn't ever have thought it of you. If I were going to be dishonest with anyone, it would certainly not be with you. Married people are supposed to trust each other."

"I'm sure you wouldn't," mother said. "And it isn't in the marriage service. Love, honor and obey are the words."

For Robert, Realist

By Marjorie Lederer Lee

Robert, Robert, small and fey,
Was anything but that today;
Was anything but wrapped in schemes Transported from a world of dreams.
Whoever knew a single elf
Who spoke so firmly to himself?
A winged sprite born of the skies
With such directness in his eyes?
What leprechaun in all the land
Has half the steadiness of hand
That Robert has? I must declare
I've never seen one anywhere;
Not anywhere, not any place,
So clear of mind, so sure of face.
And well I wonder, as I should,
About these tales of fairyhood;
Can I expect him to believe These songs of star dust that I weave?

This magic and this fantasy. . . .
Is it for Robert—or for me?

The pictures were extra good. Father fusses around a lot with his pictures. He'll make a print over and over again to get it just right, and he was making pictures to enter in a salon, and my goodness, did he fuss with this one of Rita! It was a side view and her hair was just like a light shining and everything was just right. It looked just like a movie star. Father was making some others, too, to enter. There was one of Pud and the baby that mother said had everything, only she thought it was too dark. And there were some of the lake last summer and one of mother, too, reading to Pud, and it had a spot or two on it and mother said he should make that over, really. But father seemed interested in only that one of Rita.

"This is my best picture," he kept saying, "the best one I've ever made. Look at that skin quality. Look at the light on the hair. Look at the tilt of the chin."

"The eyes and the neck aren't bad either," mother said. "Good thing we didn't use the hat. That would have been too much."

Father made maybe half a dozen large prints of that one picture of Rita.

"It's the best work I've ever done," he said. "I want to get the most out of it."

Rita's picture was hung in the salon too. And Pud and the baby and one lake one. But not mother.

Well, then one day Rita cooked up this radio party. Everyone had been so nice to her, she said, she was going to entertain all of us. Aunt Lil and Dorothy and Rita and all of us, Pud too, but not the baby, were going to go out for dinner as her guests and then came the exciting part. She had tickets for this radio broadcast.

I hadn't ever been to a broadcast, even a little one, but this was a big one. This was Rupert Dodds, and he was going around broadcasting from different cities and he was coming to ours. I just love his programs because he does such funny things with people. He makes them go out on the street and ask people silly questions just to see what happens and he gives them just wonderful prizes. He gives them sets of silverware and electric refrigerators or golden watches or diamond rings and sometimes trips. There doesn't seem to be anything he doesn't have to give away.

Pud and I were terribly excited about the broadcast and we talked about it all the time. And father thought it would be nice, too; he listens to it. Mother never listens to the radio much, but she said it sounded wonderful and she hoped we'd all get prizes.

I said, "Well, you have to do crazy things to get them and everyone doesn't get chosen."

And mother said, "Crazy things? Like what? Like buying expensive hats when you need coats and vacuum cleaners?"

And I said, "No, like jumping in a tub of water."

And she said, "Well, then, I hope you get a prize. Or," she said, and she laughed, "I hope father does. You'll concentrate hard, won't you?" she said to father. "And make them choose you and before you jump you whisper in their ear and tell them what you really want is an ultra-new-look lady's coat."

"What I really do want is a light meter," father said. "Can't I ask for that?"

"Oh, nobody sees a light meter," mother said. "Please ask for the coat."

"All right," father said, "I will." And then he pretended he was talking to Rupert Dodds.

"I'm fine," he said, "fine. How's yourself? Yes, I know a little about swimming and diving. Yes, sir, I'd be glad to answer your question and if I get it wrong what do I have to do? Dive from that springboard up there at the top of the theater into that little bitty tub of water headfirst? Certainly, certainly, sir. Go right ahead with your question. But first, I'd like to tell you that what I really want more than anything in the world is a lady's coat—extra ultra new look. What? Oh no, ha-ha, not for myself. It's for the little woman, finest little woman you ever saw. She's sitting out there in the audience right now watching me and it's only through the faith of women like her, sir, that men like me are able to do things like this, sir."

"Oh, I hope father gets on the program," Pud said. "He'd just be wonderful."

"Well, wear your old clothes," mot said, "in case you do."

But on the day of the party, mother ready to stay home. "It's more trouble t it's worth," she said. "Annie can't com stay with the baby and I'll have to keep h up from his afternoon nap to make him g and sleepy so he'll go to sleep early. I'll h to get him fed and to bed and asleep be this woman comes or he'll scream his h off. You know how he is with strangers."

Father said, "Well, I suppose you co tell them that."

"No, I can't," mother said. "They this woman for me when Annie coul come. They'd think it sounded pretty w and Dorothy thinks my children are spoi enough anyway. I couldn't tell them that could tell them I was sick, or that your un came in unexpectedly. How would that be "Terrible," father said. "Of course n You can get the baby to bed all right, an not, let him scream."

The way it turned out, they let him screa He was screaming when we left.

Mother hated to leave him. But father sa "He'll stop the minute we're gone, probab Come on and forget all about it."

Mother took a few minutes to put on new hat and she pulled her old coat down make it as long as she could, like they w them now, and we met the others and went this keen place to eat and mother seemed be having fun after all. She looked almost pretty as Rita, and father reached across t table and patted her hand and said:

"This we should do often."

And Rita said, "I can't take my eyes that hat! Is that the one you wanted me try that night? Why, I'd give my eyetee just to wear it in a picture!"

A CLOTHES-LOSER is a very expensive, wasteful and unpleasant sort of person to have in any family. Some of them just lose their coats or rubbers or hats or gloves. This Clothes-Loser is one of the worst of all. It started out in the morning fully dressed, but by now it has lost everything it had on but one sock and had to come home in a barrel. The unhappy Watchbird has found only its tie. What a foolish waster a Clothes-Loser is.

"When you're through with it, remember me," she said.

It was exciting at the radio broadcast. Things I never knew they did. They held up signs when you could laugh and when you could clap.

And there were so many people, it didn't hardly seem possible that he would, but father did, he got chosen! And at first father didn't want to go but mother's eyes were shining and excited and she said, "Oh, go on!" so he did and when he got up she whispered, "Remember the extra-ultra."

They asked father some question and I know father knew the answer but they didn't hardly let him get started to answer it at all when they said he was wrong so he had to do this thing.

They took him out somewhere and then this is what they did: They brought two one-hundred-dollar bills and they said, "Are you his wife?" and mother said she was and they gave her the bills and told her to put them in her purse and hold them for them. Then they brought father back into the room and they said, "Now this is what you have to do. You pick out the woman in this room that you honestly think is the prettiest and ask her to give to you to keep what we gave to her to hold."

Mother had a funny look on her face. She put up her hand and fixed the hat a little bit and she pulled her coat a little at the knees.

They had said "honestly" to father so he was being very careful. He looked all around the room and his face looked like he was trying terribly hard to do it right and it was very quiet, only some ladies laughing a little when father looked at them and Rupert Dodds saying, "Come, come, now, it shouldn't be that hard."

Then father started over toward us and I had to keep my mouth shut hard to keep from yelling to him, and mother still looked that funny way and she was watching him all the time. And father went over and picked up Rita's hand.

"Here she is," he said.

The people just went wild and Rupert Dodds was talking like mad but we couldn't hear him and mother looked just the same as she did, just looking straight ahead with that funny look on her face. I think she knew all the time that father wouldn't pick her and I thought it was a dirty trick they had played on mother and father, and I felt like crying.

When people quieted down enough for him to be heard, Rupert Dodds said to father, "Well, sir, do you know what you have just done? You have thrown away two hundred dollars. Yes, sir, two hundred dollars. We had given your wife two hundred dollars to hold. If you had picked her, she would have given it to you to keep."

I knew how father felt. Like I felt that time everybody laughed so when I was the only one who raised my hand when the teacher asked what a hogshead was and nobody else knew so I got to tell and I said a pig's head and it was wrong, it was a barrel.

Father said, "But you told me to pick the one I honestly thought the prettiest. My wife isn't the prettiest, Rita is."

People just howled. The radioman really was stumped. He didn't know what to do next, I guess. It wasn't working out the way he thought it would.

Poor father! He wasn't through talking. I certainly knew how he felt. Because that's the way I felt about the hogshead. He felt like he had to explain.

The people were very noisy and now Rupert Dodds held up his hand and asked them to be quiet and he said, "Let's let this man work out of this, if he can."

"My wife used to be that pretty," father said, and I could see he felt pretty terrible and like maybe he'd never be able to say what he meant. "She isn't that young any more," he said. "She has three children and does all the housework."

"You mean," the man said, "that say fifteen years ago your wife would have been your choice, but now she has worked so hard that she is not, in your estimation, the most beautiful?"

"Oh no!" father said. "I didn't say that. You didn't say 'beautiful.' You said 'pretty.' Beautiful has more to it. Work or age doesn't have anything to do with beautiful. Young girls are always prettier. That's the way Nature planned it. Why, it would be terrible if they weren't."

"It would?" Rupert Dodds said and I could tell he was making fun of father again.

"Of course it would!" father said and he was talking right up to the man now. "If they weren't they'd never get married. Men wouldn't ever choose young girls if they weren't any prettier than older women, because the older women are so much more attractive in every other way. If they were just as pretty, too, it wouldn't be fair."

Well, I don't know much about women so how could I know that father had said a wise thing? I put my head down between my shoulders and waited for them to laugh again. But there wasn't a sound.

Except in a minute, Rupert Dodds said, "Brother, you have something there. I guess maybe this man is the most truthful one we've ever had on this program. Where's that two hundred dollars?" he said to mother,

In ancient times, salt was both scarce and expensive. Hence, Roman soldiers demanded a special form of payment for the purchase of salt. Some of the famous highways of the time were built for the sole purpose of transporting salt to cities. One such road was even named Via Salarium. The salt money doled out to soldiers was called simply "salarium." So when the English-speaking world needed a word to mean regular pay, the old Roman term for salt money was altered slightly. As a result, we have the very important word, "salary!"

and she handed it over. "I think he deserves it after all, don't you?" he said and the people all cheered and when it had quieted down he said, "You know, I think someone else here deserves a prize and that's the woman who made him think that," and he gave mother another one-hundred-dollar bill! "You don't have to answer any questions to get this," he told her, "you've already won it; but if you care to tell, why did you marry the guy?"

Mother twinkled. "Oh, lots of reasons," she said. "More than I could possibly tell, but one was that he's so honest. He always tells the whole truth."

Well, it was certainly some party Rita had thrown. Father could have his light meter, mother could have her new-look coat and how did I know, maybe there was enough left over for the new vacuum cleaner.

And father said, "What do we care about how late it is; are you boys tired?"

Anybody knows what we said.

"Well then," father said, "let's go to the Gladstone and string it out awhile."

And the funniest thing happened there. I was eating this super sundae. It's one dipper of vanilla and one of chocolate and one of strawberry with sliced bananas and marshmallow and whipped cream and pecans and cherries on top. It's a sixty-five-cent sundae and I never thought I'd ever be able to get one in my life, but father had said to shoot the works. Well, I was on the strawberry and noticing how pretty it looked when you cut into it and the marshmallow ran down and the cherry juice on top of that in streaks and I heard mother say:

"A hat like this couldn't ever be a castoff, could it, Rita, so I couldn't insult you by giving it to you, could I?"

"Insult me!" Rita said.

"I'm through with it," mother said. "You take it." And she took it off and handed it to Rita. And just as I was digging into the strawberry again, Rita let out this little squeal and I knew she had had a name.

THE ANTISOCIAL CHILD NEEDS UNDERSTANDING

By Dr. Herman N. Bundesen

President, Chicago Board of Health

PERHAPS there is a child in your neighborhood about whom you are beginning to wonder. He is probably five or six years old now, and still he never ants to be away from his mother's side. A ouple of years ago you thought it was ouching, this tender devotion of mother nd child. But came the first day of school, nd the mother had to stay all day—as on as she started to leave, her offspring egan to cry and act up. The same thing happened day after day for several weeks. You began to feel sorry for the mother then.

Possibly you have heard reports that are even more disturbing. It may be rumored in the neighborhood that mothers of the younger children have to watch this youngster closely at play—he has a mean way of pushing, pinching and striking the little ones. There are shocking stories of his cruelty to neighborhood cats and dogs. Perhaps you have heard that one afternoon after school he sneaked into the classroom after the teacher had gone and destroyed property belonging to other pupils and to the school.

You would feel even sorrier if you knew how deep are the roots of this child's behavior, and how much more serious trouble is in store for mother and child in the years ahead, unless steps are taken promptly to correct the condition. I have seen many cases of this kind myself, and I know how these early and apparently harmless incidents can develop into heartache and tragedy for the whole family, if not given attention.

This early symptom that we used to call "extreme shyness" is recognized by doctors today as the beginning of antisocial behavior. Something in the child's family life or environment has made him subconsciously insecure and afraid. He responds by "withdrawing from society," protecting himself against the possible hurts of new experiences and new contacts by refusing them. Unless the exact cause of his behavior can be discovered and the right adjustment made, further withdrawals may be expected as the child grows older. Before long he will become a lonely, pitiable figure, set apart from his schoolmates by refusal to take his normal part in their work and games, and perhaps teased for his failures. Hurt again by these gibes, he withdraws still

The booklets will be sent monthly; be sure to tell us when you want the first booklet. A complete book on the care of the baby, a necessary supplement to the monthly booklets, OUR BABIES, No. 1345, is 25 cents. "Nope, Mom— you don't get out yet!"

BABY: Tch-tch, Mom! You—the lady who said she'd like to be a baby for a day—wanting out! What changed your mind?

MOM: All this crawling and wriggling around! It's made my skin so miserable! Does your skin get as uncomfortable as all this?

BABY: Glad you asked, Mom. The answer is yes. But it could be no—if you gave me the right kind of care, with Johnson's Baby Oil and Johnson's Baby Powder!

MOM: You mean I've been slipping up? That you ought to have both—every day?

BABY: Several times a day is better, Mom. Pure, gentle Johnson's Baby Oil for my after-bath smoothovers. And don't forget it at diaper changes, to help prevent what my doctor calls "urine irritation."

Now about Johnson's Baby Powder. Plenty of soft, silky sprinkles will help chase those chafes and prickles that ruin my disposition! Is it a deal?

MOM: Honey, you've convinced me—even if it had to be the hard way!

Shall we go get the Johnson's?

BABY: We're off, Mom! Get those carriage wheels turning!

more, and eventually he is completely estranged from the society in which he lives. Often along the way the child's antisocial feelings find expression in bad acts; naughtiness in the small child is replaced by cruelty and destructiveness in the later years—ultimately, sometimes, by the incorrigible behavior we call delinquency.

In the past, parents and teachers have struggled vainly with antisocial children, unable to deal with the problem successfully because they failed to understand what was happening in the child's mind.

Today we can usually recognize the early signs of social maladjustment and prevent it from becoming a problem by altering the parent's attitude toward the child. Better yet, we can teach parents to know these hazards, so that children will not be affected in the first place.

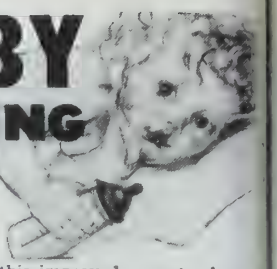
A certain amount of shyness or withdrawal is perfectly normal at various stages of the child's development. For example, the child whom circumstances have kept isolated for the first two or three years of life may be expected to show some feeling of strangeness when he is first thrown with a group. The more common mistake today is to overprotect our young children.

It is when strangeness or shyness takes an extreme form or lasts more than a day or two in the new situation that parents must look for an underlying cause. As it turns out, the trouble sometimes lies within one or the other of the parents, or in their relationship to each other. For example, the mother whose own needs for love and attention have never been adequately fulfilled may seek to compensate for this lack by lavishing an undue amount of affection on her youngster, thus laying the groundwork for a relationship which excludes the rest of the world and, while it may gratify the mother, leaves the baby unprepared for the social experiences that come later.

When elderly invalids meet with fellow victims of their own ailments, then at last real conversation begins, and life is delicious.

—LOGAN PEARSALL SMITH: Afterthoughts (Harcourt, Brace & Co., Inc.).

Another situation I have seen many times is one in which the baby is subconsciously unwanted or rejected by the mother. Sometimes the reason for this is economic; the baby may be an unconsciously felt threat to family financial security. More often, the rejection is rooted in the mother's sex life. When this is not stable or adequate, dissatisfaction may fix itself on the child who has "come between" the parents. In these cases, no matter what show of affection the mother makes toward the child, real love is lacking. Eventually, the child withdraws from contact with others and turns his attention inward. Self-love, the only kind of love he can count on, must do its meager best to satisfy his needs.



Fortunately, these deep-seated maladjustments on the part of parents are not frequent. When such a cause does emerge as the reason for a child's behavior problem, frank discussion of the situation between the parents and the family doctor is the first step toward correction.

In the majority of children in whom it occurs, antisocial behavior is the result, not of maladjustment in the parents, but of carelessness or lack of understanding of the child's needs and how to handle him. If mothers will bear in mind from the beginning that babies are human beings, with the same need for love and affection, and the same need for company that older children and adults have, these problems should not develop.

The child who has already developed antisocial tendencies needs understanding and real love, not discipline or protection. When love and understanding are given him in the measure that is every child's due, his bad behavior and inwardness will vanish.

WHY DO WOMEN CRY?

falls down and skins his leg: his mother tells him, "Be a little man. Don't be a crybaby." John thus discovers that the way to his mother's heart is by swallowing back his tears—and he is still swallowing back his tears fifty years later, when a good cry might give him the release his mind and body need.

When little Jane falls and skins her leg, she is greeted by a sympathetic, "There, there." Her mother comforts the sobbing little figure and wipes the grimy tears from her daughter's face. Jane makes a mental note: crying brings attention and love. Fifty years later she may still be using tears as a useful racket for getting her own way.

Dr. Alfred Adler, the Viennese psychiatrist, coined the word "waterpower" to describe the technique by which some women tyrannize over men by insincere appeals for sympathy. As one of his students, Dr. Olga Knopf, has said: "In human relations the weakest is often the strongest. A helpless baby is the strongest of tyrants; everyone must serve his needs. Women sometimes assume weakness to dominate their households; many a quarrel ends by the husband's giving in because he can't bear seeing his wife cry."

Psychiatrists agree that women still use tears as a weapon, but probably less often than in the Victorian age, when weeping, fainting and "the vapors" were so common that every household had its bottle of smelling salts to restore its ladies from their strategic swoons. Such tears, turned on to gain a point, have been described by Doctor Burlingame as "an adult temper tantrum." Part of the modern man's discomfort when a woman cries thus comes from a sincere doubt as to whether she is really suffering or whether he is being "worked" by "waterpower."

But modern man is in no position to scoff at woman's tearfulness. Both psychiatrists and physiologists state that the average American would improve his health if he would himself indulge in an occasional good cry (as Latin men sometimes do). This belief is more than a hunch of the doctors: it appears to have a sound basis in chemistry.

Tears contain lysozyme, an enzyme discovered by Sir Alexander Fleming, the discoverer of penicillin. Lysozyme (which also appears in saliva) is a very powerful antiseptic: tears diluted six million times still have a destructive power against some of the microbes found in the air. The normal, nonemotional secretion of tear substance about the eyes is thus a natural means of protection from infection through the eyeball.

But recent experiments made by Dr. Karl Meyer, of Columbia University, New York, show that lysozyme is also found abnormally present in the stomachs of ulcer patients, and that they produce it in exceptionally large quantities during emotional upsets. Lysozyme is always powerful stuff: it can eat through the protecting mucus that lines the stomach and lay the stomach wall open to erosion by acids among the digestive juices. Wherever lysozyme is desirable, it is not in our stomachs.

These discoveries—reported to the American College of Surgeons a year ago—have made the physicians sit up and think. For it is known that four times as many American men as women are ulcer sufferers. In crying, women may be doing much more than "letting off steam"; they may be letting off the lysozyme which would otherwise destroy the linings of their stomachs. And when men "swallow down" emotion they may also be swallowing a deadly enzyme. The habit of crying may protect our health.

But tears would not start to our eyes without some originating cause: women do not cry all the time. Why do they need to cry any of the time? Many investigators have tried to find out.

Dr. G. Stanley Hall was one of them. He reported the results of a questionnaire he had sent to several hundred college students: they listed 307 different occasions for tears in their own experience, and these proved to be so various that they could not be grouped under fewer than 47 headings. The vast majority of the students stated that they found themselves crying less as they got older, and for rather different reasons than in childhood: 122 reports of crying from anger were recorded; only 8 of these took place after the students were adult. Many of the girls reported having cried "for no reason" during adolescence.

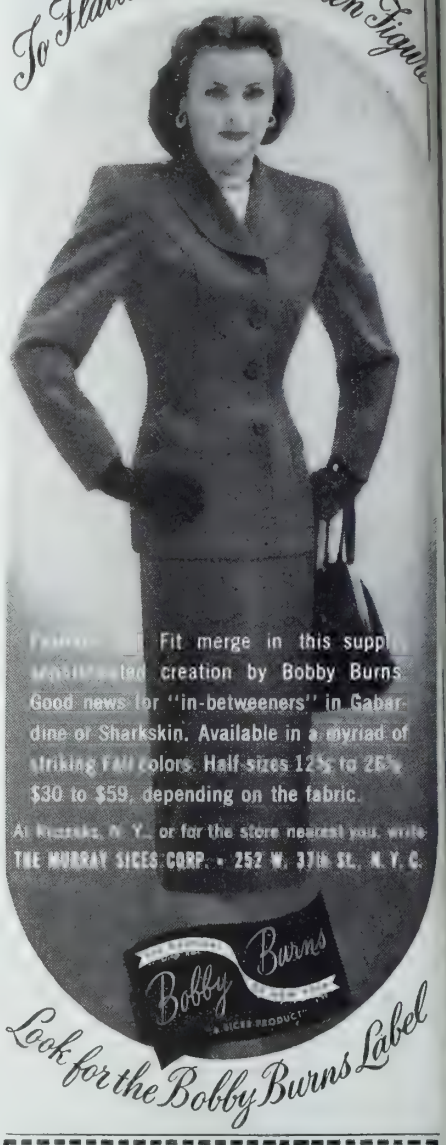
Tiredness was the commonest condition in which tears occurred. A large percentage of the returns recorded a "disturbed circulation" during weeping. Most of the students remembered having thrown themselves into a prone position while they cried. Three quarters of the returns said that the women had found themselves unable to hold back tears, no matter how much they tried. Most of them reported "relief" from crying, although a few told of serious aftereffects—stupor, nausea, sore eyes, exhaustion. One girl said a crying bout had caused an illness which lasted for over a month.

Most of Doctor Hall's students felt that fright had made them cry when they were children, but that as adults they wept only from grief or from sympathy with another person's sorrow.

Doctor Borquist, who conducted a similar survey, found fatigue to be the greatest single cause of weeping: about one quarter of all reported cases of "the weeps" seemed due to tiredness. If a woman is worn out from overwork, worry or overstudy, he found, she hardly needs a "mental" motive for crying—and her tears are apt to be hysterical and uncontrolled when she lets them go at such a time. During menstruation or the menopause, such nervous fatigue is especially apt to occur.



But crying, which may indicate a serious nervous breakdown in Jane, can be a symptom of only a very casual disappointment in Mary. For some women weep more easily than others. The most complete investigation made of this difference in inborn temperament is the work of Dr. W. H. Sheldon, of Harvard University, who studied 4000 men and women from the viewpoint of "constitutional psychology." Doctor Sheldon found he could grade the patients according to their physical and temperamental tendencies, which go hand in hand. Most of us are mixtures of the three extremes of temperament he describes: the viscerotonic (in whose physical make-up "the digestive tract is king"); the somatotonic (whose muscular system dominates); and the cerebrotonic (in whom certain functions of the brain exert control more completely than in the rest of us). All these types react differently to grief.

The woman who cries easily is, by this classification, a woman in whom the viscerotonic element is strong. She "sobs and cries convincingly at the time when it will do most good," instead of bottling up her emotion during a long, painful prelude to weeping, as members of the other categories often do. And when she cries, the viscerotonic cries hard. "Her sobs," says Doctor Sheldon, "seem to come from the depth of the abdomen."

The viscerotonic woman seems to have a particular, urgent need to cry—and to cry in company. In a time of stress, she will seek out someone with a sympathetic shoulder, will tell her troubles to a perfect stranger if she is cut off from her friends. If a viscerotonic woman can find another viscerotonic, she will get especially great relief—for men and women of this type are always sympathetic with the tears of others. "When two viscerotonics meet," says Doctor Sheldon, "a kind of emotional orgy takes place, and in this process the grief becomes dissipated. It is shared, thrown off, distributed . . . possibly in something of a literal physiological sense."

According to the Sheldon findings, it is the viscerotonics who most often cry at movies and theaters—although other types may be moved as deeply, without showing this by tears. Psychologists tell us that we all identify the characters on the stage or screen with ourselves, and Dr. George Gallup's Audience

Research Institute has verified this fact: it is women admirers who give the leading actresses their popularity, it is men who support the male stars. Thus, when a woman in the audience sees a star suffering, she may show the same emotional reactions she would express if the tragedy were her own. With a viscerotonic, this means a flood of immediate tears.

Dorothy Parker's short story, Big Blonde, vividly described the viscerotonic woman to whom tears can become a luxury and a joy. "She fell readily into the habit of tears during the first year of her marriage," wrote Mrs. Parker. "Even in her good-sport days she had been known to weep lavishly and disinterestedly on occasion. Her behavior at the theater was a standing joke. She could weep at anything in a play—tiny garments, love both unrequited and mutual, seduction, purity, faithful servitors, wedlock, the triangle.

"'There goes Haze,' her friends would say, watching her. 'She's off again.'

"Wedded and relaxed, she poured her tears freely. To her who had laughed so much, crying was delicious. All sorrows became her sorrows; she was Tenderness. She would cry long and softly over newspaper accounts of kidnaped babies, deserted wives, unemployed men, strayed cats, heroic dogs."

The other Sheldon types are unlikely to cry over strange dogs' troubles—they scarcely cry about their own. In moments of stress and sorrow, the somatotonic woman must do something strenuous: climb a mountain, go on a spending spree, take an automobile trip, do anything violent and active to get the trouble off her mind. The cerebrotonic, on the other hand, retires into a shell with her sorrow and seeks solitude. For her "to show feeling is like public exposure of the naked body. Such an individual stands tearless at the grave, although her inward feeling may be more poignant than that of the most demonstrative person." When she does cry, it is reluctantly, and through clenched teeth.

Other students of the subject agree with Doctor Sheldon that some women are more easily inclined to tears than others, but they disagree as to the cause. Doctor Lund believes that increased thyroid activity lowers the "tear threshold": young girls at adolescence are apt to be tearful, and this is also a period of thyroid growth. This gland, when it is overactive, always produces restlessness and excitability. In some women the thyroid is constantly overactive; they may be particularly inclined to tears.

Doctor Borquist also recognizes the temperamental difference in susceptibility to tears. He gives an example of two sisters who lost their mother. One of them burst out at once into uncontrollable grief; after a day or so she rapidly grew cheerful and liked to talk about her mother. The other sister shed no tears until a week had passed; then she broke down and was sick in bed for some weeks. In the first case, the emotion may have been lighter and the expression of grief less intense; on the other hand, the first sister may have had a different temperament, a more sluggish set of glands.

Whether you do or don't cry easily may provide an important clue to other aspects of your disposition: sociologists have found that, other things being equal, men who cry at movies are more apt to make very good husbands. (A man must have a somewhat exceptional supply of tenderness to be able to break through the "tough guy" convention of our society and to show emotion—and tenderness is an important quality in marriage.)

But the man who cries in the living-room tête-à-tête can be dangerous: Doctor Sheldon points out that "the viscerotonic ability to cry is a remarkably potent weapon. When a viscerotonic male sets his heart upon a woman whose quality lies a little beyond his reach, he's apt sooner or later to resort to this weapon. Men may be fairly well disciplined in resisting female tears, but against a good viscerotonic man's tears the female is at a serious disadvantage, for her own weapons are then turned against her." Some unfortunate marriages, he believes, have taken place simply because the woman could not bear to see a man in tears because of her!

Ready tears do not tell the doctor or psychologist whether you are intelligent or stupid, strong or weak: they are a symptom only of the emotional nature of a woman or a man. Dr. B. W. Richardson has written in the Dictionary of Psychological Medicine that "No one ever wept from the head; that is to say, no one ever reasoned himself into tears except through an appeal back to an emotion." But tears, he says, can often be checked by the simplest mental diversion: A woman who is about to weep at a moving scene in the theater may remember that she forgot to bring a handkerchief; that slight interruption of her attention can destroy the need to cry. "The more intense the nervous vibration, the easier is the diversion of the impulse from one center to another"—so long as the condition has not become a habit. Sometimes it does. Such excessive and habitual crying, says Doctor Richardson, can be corrected by a change of scene, by mental diversion and by an outdoor life. But alcohol should be forbidden weepers, for it "keeps up a maudlin and pitiful sentimentality. Alcohol is the mother of sorrow."

This constant crying can be a symptom of a nervous or psychological condition—but not of physical pain. Doctor Richardson reports that records of surgical operations before the days of anesthetics tell us that patients in great pain fainted and screamed, but did not cry. Women in labor do not cry, he says—unless they have been given medication which creates an abnormal psychological state. If they weep then, it is from a nervous cause, not because of the physical suffering they feel.

STUDIES of crying among the insane seem to support the view that crying is a sign of emotional recovery. Manic-depressive patients typically moan without tears in their dejected state, but they cry easily when they are passing into a state of exaltation. The conditions in which tears are commonest among the ill are paresis, arteriosclerosis, multiple sclerosis and some brain tumors—and Drs. S. E. Jeliffe and W. A. White have pointed out that the paretic patient often weeps in the midst of sublime happiness. Among mental patients only mildly ill, extreme fatigue leads to an emotional instability which may express itself in either laughter or weeping without an apparent cause.

Psychologists have attempted to explain the complex of tears by a physiological approach: it is known that their immediate cause is a secretion of the lachrymal glands in the upper and outer portion of the ocular orbital cavity. These glands are innervated by both the cranial and sympathetic divisions of the autonomic nervous system. Now, the cranial nerve supply is usually active in pleasant states, the sympathetic supply in unpleasant. Physiologists tend to believe that the cranial nerve must act in order for us to weep and that unalloyed grief, therefore, cannot be a cause for tears. Renewed hope must enter in.

Exponents of this popular view offer numerous case histories to indicate that tears come only with hope: A mother, worried and desperate when her daughter's pony came back riderless, remained dry-eyed; but when the girl turned up safely a few hours later, she was dissolved in tears. . . . A man who was fearful of his own suspected insanity was unable to cry; when a psychiatrist convinced him that he was quite sane he burst into torrents of tears. . . . A heavyweight boxer cried on his way to his corner after knocking out his opponent.

Any great privation, by this theory, merely sets the stage for weeping; our whole being is stimulated to make good the loss, but it is prevented from doing so because total misery cannot bring us tears. Energy, for which there is no outlet, causes our suffering. Yet we cannot find the release of tears until the situation gains some redeeming feature; then the contrast between our sorrow and our "lift" will let us cry.

But this theory is not shared by all psychologists: some of them prefer the older belief of Charles Darwin, whose book, Expression of Emotion in Man and Animals, was one of the first studies in the field. Darwin drew a distinction between the causes of tears in children and adults: he believed that helplessness made the child weep; hopelessness, the adult. "Tears come when the individual," he wrote, "gives up the struggle to adjust himself to the demands made upon him." Preceding the onset of tears is always a profound disturbance of the nervous system, exhaustion and a lessened power of restraint. "The conditions demand an effort which the depleted individual cannot make." Crying comes later—it "is the cessation of the state of strained effort in the direction of total giving up." By this theory, despair is at the root of our ability to weep. William James, too, subscribed to the belief that we cry when we have "reached bottom" and that crying itself makes us sadder. Our tears stop, he said,

PIG IN A POKE

Pigs cost money to raise, while cats may be raised for next to nothing on a farm. The reference in this phrase is to the practice of pitchmen at county fairs of openly displaying a fine-looking suckling pig and then having several more wrapped up in a sack which was then known as a poke. You remember the line in The Shooting of Dan McGrew, "I'll bet my poke they're true." Only a greenhorn would buy a pig without opening the bag to see the kind and quality of merchandise he was getting. The shrewd buyer who opened the bag to see the pig in the poke would of course "let the cat out of the bag."

—DAVID T. ARMSTRONG.

only from "apparent exhaustion of the machinery."

Whether we cry from hope or hopelessness, all the experts agree that we feel better afterward. Doctor Borquist says that in all grief the sufferer is in a state of apathy and collapse "with sluggish circulation and slow vital processes. If through voluntary exertion, he diverts his thoughts to new channels, the fatigued cortical centers get a rest and improved respiration and circulation give them nutrition. But if he is left alone, his energy gets lower until a storm of weeping comes to restore and restimulate." Weeping is thus Nature's substitute for friends to take our minds off our troubles. We always feel better after a cry.

(Dr. S. Weir Mitchell agreed with this—he believed and told his patients that women who cry frequently keep their youth longer!)

Literature—especially poetry—is filled with mention of tears. Often the writers seem to have known what psychologists only now are telling us—that tears are a symptom of recovery.

Alfred Tennyson's Princess offers a classic case of the way in which the grief-stricken may not be able to cry while their sorrow is completely unrelieved:

Home they brought her warrior dead;
She nor swooned, nor uttered cry.
All her maidens, watching, said,
"She must weep or she will die."

In this story, her small child was brought to the Princess; when he was in her arms, her sorrow was given the needed gleam of hope and she was able to burst into tears.

William Shakespeare is another poet whose observation of the way tears flow is borne out by modern physiological findings. "I am a fool," he wrote, "to weep at what I am glad of." But Doctor Ribot could have explained this to Shakespeare: both joy and erness, he says, act as a mild stimulus to ar glands—it is for this reason that our shine with affection or happiness. If e emotions are intense enough—and our onal tear threshold is sufficiently low—ay cry from any strong emotion. Doctor urdson reports that women in hysteria be moved to tears by fear, grief and joy g a single paroxysm.

The Ballad of Reading Gaol, Oscar e describes the utter despair of the man is to be hanged: "He did not wring his s nor weep." With this he contrasts the vior of the other prisoners on the night ecution—men who sympathized with urderer but whose sorrow for him was ved by hope for themselves: "There is no when men must weep who never yet wept," and "As molten lead were the we shed."

e same poem portrays the difference in eraments of the men, all of them in n, all of them suffering:

d some men curse, and some men weep,
And some men make no moan:
God's eternal Laws are kind
And break the heart of stone.

more modern author has also described difference in men's emotional expression le a jail. Arthur Koestler's Dialogue With th tells of a group of political prisoners g taken out of their cells to die: "'Hombre, e's no help for ,' said the warder accompanied the st. For a moment man who was ut to die was si- . And then he be- to laugh. He kept pping his knees n his hands and laughter was quiet subdued, full of e gasps and hic- ghs. 'You are only tending,' he said the priest." But second man called die "sobbed and impered like a ld." Of the third, author writes, "He gan in a low voice sing the Marseillaise. But after a few bars voice broke, and he too sobbed."

Often in literature tears are shed for an- er. "Weep thou for me in France; I for e here," says one of Shakespeare's war- rs. Because joy, fear, tenderness and sor- w all set up the same glandular reaction the body, any of them may lead us to rs. Beauty can make men cry. And so can hild's appealing face, or a story of heroism. that is required is a contrast of two states: lackening of tension, a relief from despair —in the case of tears at a sunset or a stretch sea—a sense of the unattainability of this veliness, which is so perishable.

People long separated also weep when ey are reunited: the joy merges with the emory of sorrow to give the complex emo- n required for tears to flow. In music, it the minor scale which brings tears to the es; minor harmonies arouse "unrest and ngled feelings with a desire for the com- eteness of the major chord," according to octor Lund. To cry, he says, is always the ark of a mixed state; neither sorrow, dejec- n, joy nor elation alone is sufficient cause.

EARS accompany man's unique spiritual- y: animals never cry. Man alone has chrymal glands, and even man does not ossess them in working condition at birth. abies do not shed tears until they are two three months old. They cry from the first y of life, according to Dr. Arnold Gesell, of ale University, but only through dry-eyed bs. Cretins (whose thyroid glands do not erate) never shed tears at all.

Babies do not cry from grief, which is a ghly sophisticated emotion; they cry be- use of anger, hunger, fear, pain or surprise. bservers of crying children have been un- able to detect any difference in their mode of crying—whether the cause was hunger, anger, pain or fear of falling—according to a report by Dr. Mandel Sherman in the Journal of Comparative Psychology. His studies of children sixteen months to three years old, made over a three-year period, showed that more than 100 situations caused them to cry—but that exactly the same situations often led to laughter.

DOCTOR GESELL found that in the first days of life an infant cries at any pronounced stimulus, such as being picked up. Two weeks later he will cry in the crib, but will cease crying when he is picked up. As time goes on, fewer and fewer things make him cry. Dr. N. Bayley, writing in the Journal of Genetic Psychology, says that in the first year of life children cry 15 per cent of the total time. In the baby's first month, she found pain to be the chief cause of crying; later, strange situations and odd forms of handling proved more apt to make the child weep. Dr. Catherine Williams Brackett, writing in a Teachers College, Columbia University, monograph, reports that preschool children seldom cry when they are with other children whom they like, and that they cry much less in routine situations than when they are turned loose to play.

Children's crying is taken for granted—we do not become too greatly distraught at their tears. And for the American woman, crying presents no problem: if she rarely weeps, she may congratulate herself on having a life so ordered that there are few occasions for tears. If she does cry, she has the blessing of the physicians, who will assure her that she feels much better afterward, and may even be taking a step toward renewed youthfulness by every sob!

It is the men who have to worry about tears in the American culture of today. For their Anglo-Saxon tradition of "manliness" and self-restraint, they may have to pay in the expensive coin of stomach ulcers. Their inability to cry without social censure deprives them of one of modern woman's soundest ways of letting off steam. And men are asked—while deprived of the relief of crying themselves—to endure the spectacle of a wife's weeping, with the silent reproach it often brings to them.

What can American men do? It is probably too late for them to develop the healthy habit of an occasional cry themselves. But they can, at least, comfort themselves with the modern theory that a woman weeps only when she has already begun to hope: a husband may feel less wretched if he looks upon a woman's tears as a symptom of renewed cheerfulness and not of despair. He may take a leaf from the New York credit manager—and silently hand his wife a facial tissue, as a signal to stop. Or he may let her have her cry out, supported by the medical certainty that she is doing herself a world of good.

He may even adopt the cynical device worked out for him by Charles Darwin in 1873, and probably never improved upon to this day:

"The way to stop the occasional weeping of ladies who wish to desist," Darwin wrote, "is to beg them earnestly not to try to stop and to assure them that nothing will relieve them more than prolonged and copious crying."

Doctor Darwin's recipe has a further advantage to recommend it to the distressed man of today: it completely spoils the pitch of the occasional tear racketeer whom he may encounter. For no woman can use "waterpower" to get her own way from a man who, in all sympathy, urges her not to stop. Tears are a weapon against only the man who is deathly afraid of them. THE END

Moving the range a matter of inches; giving the refrigerator, broom and china closets a shove made space for extra cabinets next range and refrigerator. Fresh paint, linoleum and wallpaper brightened the atmosphere. For the kitchen: new convenience. For the family: a room to love instead of leave.

Little annoyances add up in a kitchen like this. Sink and range get no light from window. Unshaded bulb glares and throws shadows. Supplies are crowded in high cupboards. Low table only place to work. Refrigerator isolated and opens next cleaning closet. Linoleum old and hard to clean. . . . A woman can make do in such a setup, but the doing's no fun day after day.

"HOW FAR WILL $250 GO IN MY KITCHEN?"

BY GLADYS TABER

"OF course if we expected to live here forever, it would be different," a friend of mine often says, "but as it is, we just don't want to invest a lot of money and time on the kitchen." In a way, this seems a common-sense viewpoint, but it is one I have never been able to accept. I like to flax around and fix things up even if I am only staying in a hotel for a day or two, just so I will feel at home wherever I am.

And so, when I drove out through the bustling suburbs to see the L.'s kitchen, I was singing small songs to myself all the way. Because the JOURNAL had decided to see what could be done on a budget to remodel a kitchen in a house in which the family would live a reasonable length of time, but not forever.

The L.'s felt that they could spend $250 and save money by eating more meals at home and entertaining less in restaurants, assuming they would be in this house some time. This sum was the budget for the kitchen. The final sum spent was $228.82.

This seemed very exciting to me. I don't see any real reason to throw in the towel just because you do not own your (Continued on Page 268) house. You may not start a box garden, but you can always plant things that grow in a year. You may not afford a new pine-paneled library—but why not fix up for comfortable living as much as you can? Some families rent their homes for only a year or so, but there are thousands who won't be able to build their dream house for a long time. But meanwhile they are living. Life is now, not tomorrow or next year, but today, this very minute. So why not plant the Silver Moon rosebush and build that barbecue and paint the scarred woodwork?

The L.'s expect to be some time in this particular house, and it is a pleasant, attractive place on a cool, leafy street. The landlord was willing to repaint the kitchen a good standard mud color. But naturally you couldn't expect him to fuss over the rest of it. It had an adequate range, a fairly modern refrigerator, a good sink.

It was nothing to him that Mrs. L. rushed out of the kitchen as soon as possible after the dishes were done. And getting a simple meal got the kitchen in such a mess that the family ate in restaurants as much as possible.

When I looked at the kitchen I felt that special kind of depression that comes when I find I have added up my income tax wrong and the hounds of the Government are baying at my heels. I couldn't see any hope for it either, short of tearing the whole room out. I mean, what could you do, without structural whacking about?

It was even worse because Mrs. L. had some excellent Victorian chairs and a fine drop-leaf table, a fine tole tray and some lovely china. But they looked sad and dark; lifeless, somehow, in that setting. So I looked instead at the way the sun lighted up the eyes of Mrs. L. I never saw eyes the color of fringed gentian before, but now I have, I thought, and that is a fine thing.

Meanwhile the JOURNAL staff members were crawling around on their hands and knees, measuring and measuring. They figured and wrote notes to themselves. They got under the stove and looked at the connections, and they pounded the wall as if it were a Ouija board.

By moving the range, shifting position of one tall cabinet and pushing the china cabinet a little farther into the dining area, room was made for two base cabinets—one next the range, one next the refrigerator, with an upper cabinet over it. Well-made unpainted cabinets are often good buys and may be painted any color you wish. For fitting shelves and laying linoleum on the counters and hanging the wallpaper, the L.'s paid $45 for help. A plumber moved the range for $5, the electrician installed the lighting fixtures and moved the only available electric outlet into a usable position for $10. Paint and other fixing they did themselves.

New floor covering seemed a must because the old was worn and because with such a busy, nervous, hard-to-clean kind of flooring. A serene dark green was used and cost $46.90. The budget could have been put on a 900-calorie diet, I suppose, by painting the old linoleum, but this expenditure was sound because the floor is now easy to clean and pleasing to look at.

The wallpaper cost $7.50 and added million-dollar look. I learned something from the choice of this. The stove had green enamel with a wavering marble pattern (why did the manufacturers think this was chic in the '20's?) so the wall colors just took this over and absorbed it. Also, this paper makes the end of the kitchen seem like an important separate room, which it now is; and since there is no dining room in the house, it is especially valuable to make this end of the kitchen a pleasant dining area.

Instead of the glaring exposed bulbs for lighting, a good globe was used in the work area and a charming lamp hung over the dining area. The lighting fixtures and cabinets were purchased from a reliable mail-order house.

And finally, all the Victorian walnut furniture was painted with chalk-white enamel! I was simply horrified at the idea when they told me they planned to do it. Perfectly good walnut Victorian antiques—painted! But when I saw the kitchen after it was finished I was delighted. The eating area had become gay and light and spacious-looking with all that pear-blossom white; and with white organdy curtains and a coral swag to match the seat covers and tablecloth, the effect was fresh the first day of June.

Now the lady with the gentian-blue eyes says she can hardly bear to leave her kitchen it is such fun to cook in it! As for me, I want home humming my small hum and dreaming thoughtfully of my own Victorian chairs. Maybe chalk white. . .

I told myself while I was stirring the apple sauce for supper that I wished every woman who puts up with a hundred little annoyances and inconveniences in her kitchen could see what could be done in any kitchen on a limited budget.

The next time I visit Mrs. L., I know I am not going to sit in that pleasant living room. I am going right into the kitchen and have my cup of tea at that table! Or on one of those gold-and-scarlet autumn days eat waffles and wild-flower honey and small sizzling bacon sausages while good talk makes the meal in this charming kitchen one to remember.

some pride you can call yourself a batchmaker. But you're not satisfied and then eventually you're twenty years old and the big day comes when you put aside the brown uniform and exchange it for a blue one. You're a foreman, leaning over a desk, studying batch cards, scared stiff the men working under you won't like you. You don't show it, though, and it works out all right, only you're still ambitious and finally you go back to the books you discarded. You buy a high-school chemistry text, you go to school after supper instead of bowling with the boys or calling up that cute number who lives around the corner. You sit up nights at the dining-room table until the print swims in front of you.

But it pays off finally, and one proud day you come to work in your best suit of clothes, and you don't get paint in your hair any longer. You run errands for the salesmen, check on orders for them. You know the factory and now you get an inkling of the men who sell what you used to make. You have bad moments, but you learn; you stammer a few times, but finally you learn how to talk to a purchasing agent. And you look at a desk that someday will be yours.

Willy came back into the general offices. He scrawled some waybill information on a telegram blank, handed it in at the switchboard, then sat on the edge of a desk, swinging one foot, glaring at the next telegram in his hand. The odor of paint clinging to his nostrils was replaced by the scent of perfume.

Mary said softly, "Sitting still for once, Willy? I didn't think you knew how to sit still."

Now he should say something, Willy thought to himself. Now he should come up with a bright remark to draw a smile from her. Something he had never learned to do. He'd thought it would come easier when he got his feet under a desk.

Willy said, "I see you have the file on Durkee there. Let me see it. I want to check on a letter I wrote them last week."

Mary's sigh was almost imperceptible.

Willy grimly read his letter, then went off again, the heel-and-toe champion of the office, heading toward the testing labs where a quart sample was being held up.

That was on a Friday. Monday morning at nine o'clock Willy was out in the plant and hard at work tracking down some information. Nine-thirty he got back into the general offices and pulled up short. A magnificent young man in tan sports coat, dark flannel trousers and white shoes was sitting there at Carter's desk.

Mr. Clayton bobbed up, gave Willy a small and rueful wink, and said, "Willy Kepper, meet Jack Ogden. I've been instructing Ogden in his duties, Willy. I'd like you to give him a grand tour of the plant."

Ogden stood up and grinned, extending a hand. "How do you do?" he said cordially.

Willy grasped his fingers briefly, said, "Let's go," and turned on his heel. Ogden trailed after him into the shop.

Frankie Kovaleski came by, glanced at Ogden's clothes and murmured sotto voce at Willy, "Hey, kid, who's your friend?"

Willy, not answering, stabbed a finger at the tanks coming down from the ceiling, pitching his voice above the roar of the electric motors. "Paint's made in those," Willy said. "They're unloading there at number seven now."

Ogden said, "Kind of dirty work, isn't it?"

"We're not manufacturing lace panties," Willy said coldly. "Come on. This is the mill room we're going into now."

"Nine to five from now until I grow a beard," said Ogden. "What a life."

Willy, ignoring this, gave him a brisk tour, taking him upstairs where the batches were made, and through the laboratories. Finally he left him at his desk again. "I'm busy," Willy said, and went off down the corridor, his jaw tense.

But worse was yet to come. Later in the day he went through the offices and found Ogden standing by the files, looking appreciatively at Mary. He murmured something and Willy, snatching up the phone awaiting him, heard Mary's rippling laughter.

"Your order's been shipped," Willy snapped into the phone, "by Forest Vans. Left here yesterday morning. Right." Willy slammed down the receiver. He did not ordinarily talk so brusquely to a purchasing agent. He had developed the technique of the voice that soothes, but he was unable to practice it today.

At five that night Willy had a last-minute telegram to send. He lingered in the office, then went outside and there at the curb Ogden was helping Mary into a flashy convertible. "'Night, Willy," Mary called and Ogden grinned and waved. Willy watched the car purr down the street, uppercut violently at the air, then stalked across the street toward his battered sedan.

THE next morning as usual Willy started down the corridor. He came to the big steel-sheathed door that marked the division between the offices and the plant itself and kicked it open. The door slammed back on its hinges and Willy tramped on through, his eyes chilly and lips taut.

Near the door was Frankie Kovaleski, leaning on his desk, studying his day's batch cards, biting a generous cud from a plug of tobacco. He grinned amiably at Willy.

"That order of black wrinkle for Mergenthaler," Willy barked at him. "What you been doing with it, saving it for a Christmas present?"

This was no way to talk to Foreman Kovaleski and most unlike Willy. Kovaleski, gagging on his tobacco, straightened as though he had been stabbed and let out a bull-like roar of rage.

"You think I ain't making nothing else but wrinkle for Mergenthaler?" Kovaleski screamed. "Look at them batch cards they throw at me. I ain't Superman. I do my work and no lousy ——"

"Get the lead out," Willy said.

Kovaleski, a bosom friend of Willy Kepper until this moment, doubled a hamlike fist, but Willy wasn't there; Willy was marching out to the shipping room where Foreman Ed Jenkins, supervising a truck loading, was surreptitiously glancing over a racing tip sheet, hopefully looking for a sleeper.

"You bum," shouted Willy, "why don't you live at the track? You're about as slow as some of the horses you bet on. You never shipped that order for Carson Brothers last night."

Ed Jenkins' face turned an unhealthy purple. "The truck never showed up," he shouted, outraged. "What you want I should do, carry them five hundred gallons out to Pittsburgh on my back? Nobody talks to me ——"

"Get going, get going," Willy snarled and trotted on while Ed Jenkins stamped around the shipping room in a frenzy.

Willy's next port of call was small order, where one Fats Barto had been in charge these twenty years. A fierce and independent man, Fats was now reclining on a barrel, sipping coffee from a paper container and munching a doughnut which would sustain him until ten o'clock, when he would eat the first of three lunches.

"Listen," Willy yelped at him, "you were supposed to make up a quart sample for Jarvis. A rush order. What are you running down here, a free lunch? You sit there and feed your face all day ——"

Fats Barto put down his coffee cup with shaking hand, snatched a bung wrench and brandished it threateningly. "I will split your skull," Barto screamed, "and stuff you in a mixer. I ——"

"Come on, come on," said Willy and moved on through the door. His steps carried him through the furnace room, where Mike Bedeen, one of the really solid men around the factory, was taking three minutes off for a quick cigarette. Willy, in passing, snarled, "That pile of coal you're sitting on, you're sure it's comfortable? Maybe I should bring you down a davenport."

Mike Bedeen had his mouth open, but when he finally managed to get out some highly flavored expletives, Willy had shot out of hearing into the yard, where with a few well-chosen words he laid low the yard boss, and then darted onward to the varnish shack.

Ab Snyder, short of help, was racing around doing the work of two men.

"Well," said Willy, "for once you got off a dime. What's the matter, got a wasp up your pants?"

He ducked the sample can Ab threw at him, went back to the office and yanked open a file. Willy scowled into it, then slammed the drawer shut.

"Who louses up these files?" he said. "I'm sick and tired of playing hide-and-seek whenever I want some information."

There was a small gasp behind him. Mary's face was flaming. Willy gulped suddenly and Ogden looked up from his desk. "Don't let that little Napoleon scare you, Mary," he said.

Willy stamped up the stairs toward the labs.

Meanwhile, out in the shops, a dozen men or so were grimly and individually planning the murder of one Willy Kepper, thinking dreamily, as they worked, of the various ingenious ways in which they would rend him limb from limb.

But within the factory the grapevine had begun to function, starting with a stenographer in the office, relayed finally to the desk where Frankie Kovaleski brooded.

At noon, Kovaleski and his friends sat against the brick wall outside the plant, basking in the sun, devouring egg sandwiches, salami, milk and coffee.

"Willy ain't himself," said Kovaleski. "You know Mr. Ogden?" Kovaleski gesticulated. "Big fat guy with two chins and a ruid im beak." Thus did Kovaleski characterize Jasper P. Ogden, local philanthropist and civic leader. "Well," pursued Kovalesi, "Willy is all set to move into Carter's jolt and this Ogden he puts his son into his plae and Willy is back of the eight ball while thi rah-rah boy comes in here and makes wit the Whiffenpoof Song or something."

Resentment against Willy Kepper died a suden death. The men considered this, and thn young Ogden came in view, white shoes an all, and from the brick wall a dozen pairs of yes scrutinized him with disfavor. Beside hi walked a girl, young, lovely in the sunshe. Wordlessly, the men watched her get inOgden's car, watched Ogden drive off dom the street.

A moment later Willy appeared, unhurrid for once. He glared after the car, then shfled down the sidewalk and halted in fro of the men.

I blew my top this morning," Willy said. "I sorry, boys."

"Forget it, Willy," they assured him, and Wlly went along.

Frankie Kovaleski, speaking around his thd egg sandwich, said, "That ties it. That rely wraps it up. Not only does this sk steal Willy's job, he also swipes his gi" d Jenkins demured. "Willy ain't got a girl. He never died Mary, to my knowledge."

"All the same," insisted Frankie Kovaleski, "she's his girl. He told me so himself at the company banquet. He said to me, 'Kovaleski,' he said, 'I love that dame.'"

"He don't act like it," Ab Snyder said, "but if he said so, I guess he does. And that cheerleader walks off with her."

They brooded on this injustice to their fellsom friend and Fats Barto, speaking softly, said finally, "We should ought to do something for Willy. Willy is one guy in that office who knows something about the paint business. And he has gone to bat for us. It was Willy got them to give us the new washrooms. Maybe," said Fats, "we could get this Ogden to change his mind. Maybe we could convince him in a nice way that he don't like the paint business."

Thereafter they talked in whispers, punctuated now and then by hoarse laughter.

YOUNG Ogden emerged from the plant that night with Mary by his side. They walked over to the car, Ogden helped her in with a flourish, went around and got behind the wheel. The car started with a low purr of power, galumphed forward ten feet and stopped.

Ogden got out, examined a rear wheel and said, "I have a flat."

"Can I help?" Mary said, but Ogden was tiefully punching the spare.

"No air in that, either," he said. "You'd better take the bus." He started out on foot to find a gas station.

The next morning Ogden had occasion to go into the plant and check an order. He opened the big door, stepped briskly inside and approached Frankie Kovaleski, who was engaged in balancing a large drum on one knee, while a stream of liquid the consistency of molasses flowed from it into a gallon container.

"I say," Ogden declared in businesslike tones, "I'm looking for an order ——"

His speech ended in a sudden yawp. Frankie Kovaleski had momentarily lost control of the drum. It slipped off his knee and crashed to the floor. Kovaleski righted it almost instantly, but not before a stream of the heavy liquid had flowed across the virginal white shoes of Ogden.

Strong-man Kovaleski, who had won a reputation for spinning a three-hundred-pound drum across the floor as though it were a papier-mâché imitation, said, "It got loose from me. It was too much for me."

A passing workman said angrily, "You clumsy Polack. Here, Mr. Ogden, let me wipe your shoes off." Solicitously he pulled a rag from his hip pocket, bent and swabbed Ogden's shoes. Unfortunately, there were smears of red paint on the rag. The workman straightened up and said, "That is sure a shame, Mr. Ogden."

Kovaleski was also apologizing profusely, and then a hoarse voice yelled, "Make way."

AN apparition came into view, a staggering pair of legs surmounted by bundles of empty five-gallon containers that teetered eccentrically. Ogden jumped to one side, the staggering legs moved crazily that way, and suddenly the whole pile of cans crashed about their heads, bounded on the concrete floor.

Ed Jenkins stooped, brushed aside sundry cans and helped Ogden to his feet. "Never seen you standing there," Ed said, dusting him off. "Mighty sorry, Mr. Ogden."

"Look out!" a voice yelled and Ogden leaped four feet backward as Fats Barto came racing down the floor, pushing a loaded hand truck from side to side like a demented roller coaster. "Watch that caustic," someone shouted, and Ogden leaped again, and this time he kept on going, back into the safety of the office.

Out in the shop, Fats Barto and his colleagues exchanged brief, satisfied glances and went back to work.

There were giggles in the office when Ogden came in. He looked ruefully at his once-white shoes, sat down at his desk and the telephone rang. A feminine voice said, "Will you please get Mr. Clayton a quart of high viscosity from the plant? He wants it immediately."

Ogden looked at the pile of telegrams on his desk, one of which posed a query he had been trying vainly to answer since nine o'clock. He shuddered at thought of going back into the shop, then got to his feet, went down the corridor and apprehensively opened the door.

Frankie Kovaleski, at his desk, beamed at him. "Something I can do for you, Mr. Ogden?" he asked solicitously.

Ogden smiled at this co-operation between labor and management. "I want a quart of high viscosity, please."

Kovaleski's broad hand slapped his leg, his eyes were brimming over with sympathy. "Now that is tough," said Kovaleski. "I just this minute run out of the last high viscosity I had. Try Fats Barto, down in small order."

Barto, engaged in a midafternoon snack while he peered into the mixing tanks, was also the soul of courtesy. "Funny you should ask me about that," Fats said. "I'm going to be needing some high viscosity myself soon. Go see Ab Snyder, in the varnish shack. I think he had some."

Ab Snyder sent Ogden to the mill room; from there Ogden went out into the yard and found the yardman standing in the entrance to a warehouse filled with drums.

"High viscosity?" said the yardman. "I ain't had any call for high viscosity lately. You see that last barrel? That one way over in the far corner? Stand on tiptoe, Mr. Ogden, and you can make it out. That's the only

Half of Me Dreams

By Elaine V. Emans

Half of me dreams of living on a hill
With windows opening on distant space
In greening spring, but half of me is still Content with April in a sheltered place.

The half of me would watch October turning
Her entire countryside to flaming gold;
Yet sometimes seeing one near maple burning
Is all the glory that my heart can hold.

...dow I go left. Here's a [illegible] wrench. Help yourself. I'd get it for you only I got to rustle this solvent."

Ogden looked helplessly at the wrench in his hand, then at the drums. He removed his coat, approached the first drum, grunted and shoved it to one side. Grabbing the next one, ignoring the tarry substance on his hands, he tugged at it and began to make a path to the drum in the far corner. From time to time across the yard workmen emerged briefly from the factory to look a moment at the perspiring young man.

An hour later Ogden came back into the plant, paint stains on his shirt and trousers and smeared across his forehead. Grimly he smiled down at the quart of black liquid in one hand. He went into Clayton's office, put it triumphantly down on the desk blotter.

Mr. Clayton's chair shot backward. "You're smearing up my desk. Get it out of here."

"You wanted it," Ogden said, baffled and angry. "Your secretary phoned for it. She said you wanted a quart of high viscosity immediately."

"What?" The grim lines around Mr. Clayton's mouth relaxed. He settled back in his chair, chuckled, and then smiled at the flushed young man confronting him. "Ever study physics, Ogden?" he said gently.

"Yes, sir," Ogden said. "Freshman year. I ——" Ogden seemed to shrink inside his coat, his face reddened. "There's no such thing as high viscosity. At least, it's not a substance. What a chump I've been."

He turned abruptly and went outside, back to his desk. Frowning, he stared down at a crumpled telegram and shook his head in bewilderment.

Willy Kepper was hustling down the corridor late that afternoon when he braked to a stop barely in time to avert a collision with Mr. Clayton, who came charging out of his office like a maddened bull.

"Where's that Ogden?" shouted Mr. Clayton. "He doesn't answer his phone. Boss's son or not, I am going to feed him to the birds."

Willy tried to repress the joy that flowed within him. "I'll try and locate him," he said. "What's the trouble?"

Mr. Clayton recognized Willy then and calmed down, but not much. "A telegram came in late last night from Cooper," he said. "I gave it to Ogden first thing this morning. I was rushed. 'Get the information,' I told him, 'and phone Cooper immediately.' I've been in conference and now my secretary tells me she just had a long-distance call from Croydon, Cooper's purchasing agent. He was hopping mad. He hadn't heard from us. Four o'clock and I gave that wire to Ogden at ten of nine this morning."

THE shop door opened suddenly and Ogden came in view, disreputable-appearing and stained with toil, his jaw set grimly. Willy was amazed to find that he suddenly felt sorry for him. He also perceived that being the boss's son was not entirely a gravy train. Willy thought of his own early days in the company, looked again at Ogden, then sighed to himself and made up his mind.

"Gosh, Mr. Clayton," Willy said, "I took that telegram from Ogden. I told him I'd handle it."

Mr. Clayton's face was purple. "Well?"

"I got a phone call when I was in the shipping room. I put down the wire and left it there. Never thought of it until this minute. I'll take care of it right now." He darted down the corridor before Clayton could speak. He lunged into Ogden, whispered hoarsely, "Come on," and went out into the plant. "That telegram from Cooper," Willy snapped at him when the door swung shut.

"I can't find the information," Ogden said. "I've been trying off and on all day. You don't have to take the rap for me. I'm not asking any favors ——"

When two people are under the influence of the most violent, most insane, most delusive and most transient of passions, they are required to swear that they will remain in that excited, abnormal and exhausting condition continuously until death do them part.

—GEORGE BERNARD SHAW.

Willy had snatched the telegram. "Th[illegible] a cable lacquer. Did you see Kincaid?"

Ogden shook his head, and Willy was off on the run, out into the street. He dodged a truck, went on to Kincaid's presence, and a moment later grabbed up a phone.

"Get Croydon of Cooper for me," he said, jotted figures on a sheet of paper, and th[illegible] with Ogden at his heels, went back to the general offices.

THE switchboard operator nodded at h[illegible] and Willy perched on Ogden's desk and pick up the phone.

"Mr. Croydon," Willy said, "Kepper ta[illegible] ing." Willy took a deep breath. He held t[illegible] phone six inches from his ear and Ogden hea[illegible] a flow of words he could not distinguish, b[illegible] their meaning was nevertheless unmistakab[illegible] "It was inexcusable, Mr. Croydon," Wil[illegible] said finally, "but I'd like to tell you how [illegible] happened." Willy winked one eye at Ogde[illegible] "The telegram came in last night after o[illegible] offices were closed. That's the reason for th[illegible] delay. The wire was mislaid and didn't tur[illegible] up until a few minutes ago. As soon as I sa[illegible] the date line on it I knew what had happene[illegible] I have all the information for you." Will[illegible] talked on for a few moments, then hung u[illegible] and grinned at Ogden. "We wiggled out of it," he said. "A slight distortion of the truth. white lie, maybe you could call it."

Ogden, looking at him with admiration said, "I couldn't have done that."

Willy laughed mirthlessly to himself. In th[illegible] first place, he didn't believe it. If Ogden coul[illegible] talk easily and glibly t[illegible] a girl like Mary, the[illegible] he could talk the ear[illegible] off any purchasing agent who ever lived. He went out into the corridor and Ogden followed him.

Willy said, "The boys have been playing a little rough, haven't they?"

"I can take it," Ogden said.

Too bad, said Willy to himself, adding aloud, "How do you like the paint business?"

"You know, Willy," Ogden said, "so far I've hated it. I've been so dumb about everything. But I think I'm going to like it someday."

So that was that. Willy went out into the shop and found Frankie Kovaleski laughing to himself.

"Willy," he said, "this'll kill you. We got a drum of red oxide been sitting out in the sunshine. It'll practically explode. We got it all fixed up for Ogden to unscrew the bung tomorrow ——"

Willy considered for a moment the pleasant image of Ogden coated red from head to foot, then shook his head. "Forget it. He's a good guy. Why couldn't he have been a heel? Lay off him, Frankie. Pass the word around."

Willy came to work the next morning, glanced at his assignments, then started for the shop. Kovaleski was not at his desk, but a workman was filling off near by, a man obviously new to the game, nervously checking the valves, moving his feet like a cat on a hot stove.

"Hey, Mac," said Willy, and broke off short. The man was Ogden. He shut off a valve, and grinned at Willy.

"I'm slow," he said, "but I'll get better. I'll show that Kovaleski yet. In fact, I think I have him buffaloed already."

"What are you doing here?" said Willy.

"Learning the paint business," Ogden said. "I hope to graduate before too long." Ogden kicked a container into position and opened the valve cautiously. "Of course I have a break, my old man being who he is. But one of these days anyone who says I rode in here on my father's reputation will get his block knocked off." He grinned at Willy. "You straightened me out. Like to pay you back that favor sometime."

Willy turned away, had a sudden thought, and came back. "One thing," he said. "How'd you make time so fast with Mary?"

"Make time?" Ogden said. "All I did was ride her home, Willy. I pass her house on the way. Nothing else."

"But how'd you get so friendly?" Willy persisted.

Ogden said, "Darned if I know. I made some crack. I don't remember what. I think I said something about her eyes. Why?"

"I just wondered," Willy said, and tramped back to the office. He pulled out the chair that would be his from now on and sat down. "Something about her eyes," Willy muttered, looked up and there she was.

"Good morning, Willy," she said.

"Morning," said Willy, laconic as ever; then, as she turned away, he added, "Oh, Mary."

"Yes?" she said and looked pertly at him.

Something about her eyes, said Willy to himself with anguish. "Your eyes," said Willy, and halted. Business English had never prepared him for anything like this.

Mary looked interested. "Crossed or something?" she said.

"Oh, skip it," said Willy helplessly.

"Well, I like that," Mary began, and Willy put a restraining hand on her arm.

"Look," said Willy, "could I come over some night? Say Friday?"

Mary's eyes were larger than ever. She seemed a trifle stunned. "After six months," she said. "Willy, I have to get used to this." She peered at him. "You want to tell me something about my eyes on Friday night, Willy?" She looked suddenly darkly suspicious. "Or did you want to go over the files to make sure I haven't loused them up?"

"About your eyes," said Willy, very firm on this point.

"Then Friday is fine," Mary said. "About eight." She moved on past him, but turned to smile just before she went out the door.

Willy, his feet beneath the desk in executive formation, figured that by Friday night he could think of something.

vegetable and flower beds that are Mary's particular pleasure, adorned with a flowering-apricot tree and festooned with a crisscrossing clothesline. The house itself is a compact box, rather pleasant to look upon, but awkward in arrangement and heated by an oil-stove. The living room and dining room make up the downstairs front, the kitchen and a small bathroom make up the rear; upstairs one room is the children's bedroom, with double-decker former Army bunks for Freddie and Judith, and a crib for Suzanne; Mary and Ben share the other bedroom, and a nondescript half room, half closet at the end of the hall serves as the catchall space no family is without.

Today, life with the Schultzes begins on tiptoe when the children get up before seven, slide from their beds and go with small shushes down the stairs to get their own cereal. When they are half through, Ben comes in, has some coffee and a roll, and the children scatter to the bathroom, to their room, into their clothes, and Freddie and Judith set off for school just after Ben leaves for work. Suzie finds a doll, or crawls into her mother's bed for an extra snooze and snuggle. This early-morning pattern began when Mary was recuperating from a hysterectomy last winter, and, since the Schultzes are as flexible as a rubber band, will probably continue only so long as everyone likes it.

Mary is up by eight-thirty and, after clearing away the breakfast dishes, all of which are piled neatly on the sink, is ready for whatever the big job is. Monday it's washing; Tuesday, ironing; Wednesday and Thursday, sewing, darning, and gardening if the weather is good; Friday and Saturday, house cleaning. Saturday is the only day she works in the children's room: in addition to making their own beds, they hang up their clothes, put away their toys—but they have a busy little habit of folding grubby socks and mussed dresses in with clean ones that has to be checked on or they run out of clothes.

Monday and Friday are probably the hard-workingest days for Mary. The washing is a mighty one: 12 shirts; 5 small sheets, 2 large; 8 pairs of panties and as many shorts; 30 pairs of socks; 15 dish towels, 10 bathroom towels and 6 washcloths; 8 little-girl dresses, 2 house dresses for Mary; 4 or 5 pajamas, 2 nightgowns and the usual assortment of odd bits. Everyone has his or her idiosyncrasies which must be respected: Mary can't sleep on a wrinkled sheet, Suzie likes a dry towel after every washing, Judith wants her hair ribbons pressed each time she wears them. The washing machine, however, is a good one, and Mary rather enjoys ironing—especially on the difficult jobs like fussy little pleats—and in the summer she can always take a good look at the garden, which is her particular job, while she is hanging out the clothes.

By eleven-thirty it is time to start lunch—for everyone comes home for lunch, an easy meal of salad and a sandwich, stew on bread, or soup and grilled cheese on toast. The children eat heartily and swiftly; Ben enjoys anything and Mary loves having a sociable break in the day. In a flurry, at twelve-fifteen everyone has gone but Mary. Suzie goes to afternoon school by herself; she is the only child now attending public school: both Judith and Freddie are absorbed in the school-plus-church rituals of the Polish Catholic school near their home. After they receive what Ben believes is the religious training and knowledge necessary to them, they will return to public school, where they went until recently. Both are currently in a fanatical stage of collecting saints' pictures, keeping their own holy water, memorizing lengthy chants and hymns, and every day, every meal, opens and closes with a prayer. Neither Ben nor Mary is as ardent in worship; Ben frequently misses church, and so does Mary.

After lunch, Mary continues with her housework, or sews or crochets. She is an expert crocheter, with several prize afghans. In the spring, summer and fall she works continually in the garden; she grows both vegetables and flowers, and keeps the family in salads from July through September. Despite the fact that she has had two operations and one miscarriage in the past three years, she rarely takes a nap, and says she would have to be so sick she couldn't even crawl about on her hands and knees before she'd hire anyone to do "her job"—the care of her home and family.

About four, the children dodge in, announce they are home, and speed out again to play. All of them are unfailingly polite in the simplest, healthiest way. They rarely interrupt, take a glowing pleasure in doing things for their mother or their father, and are precociously social about guests, helping them off with their coats, making them comfortable, greeting them by name. Neither Mary nor Ben can decide just how this has occurred; it is obvious that they learned by example (still the best teaching method!) and by the fact that "badness" is not only not tolerated, it is considered impossible. The major form of discipline is isolation: if the children don't play well together, they are separated; if they break things, are rude or obstreperous, they are not permitted to play outdoors. None of them was ever a "problem" child; as babies, they all slept quietly through the night and played happily through the days. Freddie and Suzanne also have long histories as good eaters, but Judith, as an infant, couldn't accept the usual formulas and until she went on canned milk, when she was almost a year old, she was a frighteningly bony baby. Today this is hard to believe: she has the big, dulcet-brown eyes and turned-up nose of a beauty, a sturdy body and intrinsic charm.

IF there's one thing the swift pace of modern living demands, it's frequent and complete relaxation . . . letting down, taking it easy. And that is exactly what Greyhound offers, in generous measure . . . freedom from driving strain and traffic trouble—mental ease matched with physical comfort!

Check the different kinds of trips your family takes in a year—vacationing, shopping in the city, week-ending with friends, commuting, traveling for business, or just sight-seeing—and you'll find that they offer a lot more travel ease, more peace of mind, if made in the reclining-chair comfort of a Greyhound SuperCoach.

Suzanne, a charmer herself, was an ideal baby. She was born at home before Mary could get to the hospital, with only a neighbor on hand, and Mary believes her happy-go-lucky temperament is due to the fact that she has never known even the regimentation indigenous to hospitals. Mary is not one to operate "by the book"; all the children have been generously cuddled, fed when they were hungry—within reason, of course—and their cries always answered. There are certain rules so thoroughly understood they are rarely broken: no eating between meals; get your glass of water before you go to bed; let me know where you're going; don't go near the street; come home when you say you're coming home; and the great big rule—do unto others as you would have them do unto you. "I hate bratty children," Mary says, "don't you?" Sometimes, Ben says, Mary is too firm with the youngsters, but, incapable of saying a cross word to anyone himself, he usually adds that it's probably a good thing that she is. There are times when her voice is quick and exasperated, and times when she is tired, and times when she is proprietary and demanding, but she never nags and she smiles as easily as she breathes.

After the children have gone happily to bed—at eight o'clock or so—the strange sound of Polish hymns (which the children sing meaninglessly but sweetly) floats downstairs, and Ben and Mary sit in the living room, reading, sewing or talking over a glass of beer. Both read the daily newspaper—the Toledo Blade—are cover-to-cover fans of news magazines and love to pit themselves against the "college graduate" scores in current-events tests and beat them; both read novels and classics, fiction and nonfi and value the local library highly, as the local bookstore. Ben used to walk miles to the downtown library to get b now he takes pride in buying his own.

Mary is also a collector: she has a larg fancy array of salt and pepper shakers match holders, most of which have given to her; because she is small she collects the dresses her friends buy that don't like—and which she makes ove herself so that they do. Ben likes to get special dress now and again, too, and, one of her vanities is pretty legs, she's collection of shoes too. Ben cares les clothes, gets along with one good suit, w sports jackets and slacks to work, to with a pea jacket. His entertainment to bowling twice a week during the wi and football and baseball games in seaso

Their evenings out are usually spent their great friends and, incidentally, relati Frank Domalski and his wife, Ben's sis Minnie. Frank and Minnie run a spotless spacious delicatessen, known particul for Frank's expert baking. On Fridays, way of relaxation, Ben helps Frank w the baking and is getting pretty expert h self. Saturday evenings are invariably sp dancing and talking, or eating out with Domalskis, and sometime during the even Ben picks out the week's groceries from M nie's carefully arranged shelves, and s them to himself—paying usually somewh in the neighborhood of $18, with another or $8 going for milk and an extra loaf of bre or spot of butter during the week.

A third of their weekly income goes in food, a large portion into insurance and vestments; they are building up a generc endowment policy for Freddie, and a smal one for each of the girls. The managing of t money is haphazard, but well understoo Ben handles the cash, with Mary asking what she needs. The children all have the own banks—Freddie is definitely saving a bike—but none of them have allowanc because, when entrusted with them, t money all went for candy.

"I think the main thing for them to lea now is to get along with other people," Be says. "The rest of learning comes fairl easily if you learn that young—and there no happiness without it. I believe hard wor and confidence in yourself make for success- but I don't think success is worth a thing you've nobody who cares about you, or yo don't care about anyone."

It's a long cry from Ben's childhood i terms of comfort—but the things he learne then are paying off now. And the family motto, echoing Mrs. Bock, in the words o young Suzanne, is: "We feel goodest whe we're good." THE END

RUTH WOLFF

"I had sworn not to do any writing during my visit in a charming old house in Concord, New Hampshire, but one evening the conversation turned to a girl of 'very loose morals.' The next morning I wrote A Week End is Not Enough (page 38). I think the house inspired me. It seemed to stand for character, for the New England of Thoreau, Emerson and the Alcotts. Even the elm trees, gold with the promise of a clean, white winter, were a reminder that spring always blooms again."

HARRY ANDERSON
(Illustration, page 50)

"He majored in mathematics at Illinois State, but switched to art and was graduated from Syracuse. He went to New York and entered upon the usual lean days of artists. His garret was in MacDougall's Alley in the Village. Not being my husband's severest critic or knowing a smidgen about art, I am most impressed by his infinite patience and TLC*. He will wash out a drawing a dozen times before he is finally satisfied. . . ." Ruth E. Anderson.
*Tender Loving Care.

ADELINE MARX

"No Greener Grass (page 66) is one of the few short stories I have written without the collaboration of my husband, Joseph. I suppose I decided to do it one day when I got home late and found I still had dinner to cook. With two small children I know what it is to work against a dead line. I did the last two chapters of my last book between the day one daughter got over chicken pox and the day the other came down with it. I finally made it, just ahead of the spots."

The LION'S ROAR

Published here monthly . . . Column No. 112

The greatest star of the screen!

Leo, your dependable M-G-M Lion, sensing the needs of the times, now comes along with an entertainment designed to make you forget everything but the popular stars and their hilarious adventures in "No Minor Vices".

★ ★

We want to be first to tell you how well they have succeeded: "No Minor Vices" is a major triumph, a merry, madcap, utterly delightful movie, a fine job by the Enterprise Studios.

★ ★ ★

Those enterprising and highly entertaining gentlemen have cooked up as saucy (and as neatly naughty) a dish as one could hope to find.

★ ★ ★ ★

Basically, "No Minor Vices" poses the question, "Can an artist's model be a model wife at the same time?"

★ ★ ★ ★

Although zephyr-light and zany, it packs more wisdom into its reels than a dozen weighty tomes on Marriage, Men and Morality.

★ ★ ★ ★

As for its stars, there's dashing Dana Andrews as The Husband (a very attractive husband, jealous and very much in love).

★ ★ ★ ★

There's the good-looking new star, Louis Jourdan as The Lover (tempestuous, uninhibited and very much in love—maybe).

★ ★ ★ ★

And then there's the alluring young wife turned model. She is Lilli Palmer (beautiful, bewitching and very much in love—but definitely).

★ ★ ★ ★

Lilli you may remember was the girl in "Body and Soul" who contributed so unstintingly of both. In "No Minor Vices" she turns in, if you'll pardon the expression, an equally well-rounded performance.

★ ★ ★ ★

Loud mention should also be made of the gifted supporting cast headed by lovely Jane Wyatt. She plays a nurse (very much in love, too).

★ ★ ★ ★

And there's a live lobster affectionately called Jabberwock. Even he (or she) has oodles of personality.

★ ★ ★ ★

Arnold Manoff's scenario brims over with freshness and originality. Lewis Milestone contributed super-skillful direction and production.

★ ★ ★ ★

Having said all this, we feel that you have a fairish idea of the way we feel about "No Minor Vices" which is simply: Please don't miss it.

In June the JOURNAL published a color picture of Mount Rainier "disappearing in mist across a mountain lake." Not only did this picture offend the many lovers of America's greatest glacial peak, but it has now been discovered that the picture was actually not taken at Mount Rainier at all, but at Lake Quinault, in the state of Washington.

With apologies to Mount Rainier and its devoted admirers throughout the country, the JOURNAL and the authors of the article, John and Mary Adele Morris, are now happy to publish this true portrait of Mount Rainier, looking across Paradise Valley from the highway, with Paradise Inn at the foot of the mountain.

Our Readers Write Us

The Way to a Man's Heart

Tacoma, Washington.

Dear Editors: I love that Ann Batchelder! Her wonderful ideas won me a husband. He proposed after I started cooking with her as my guide.

Sincerely,
GLORIA R. CROFT.

Men in Mirrors

Burbank, California.

Dear Sirs: Thank you for publishing my letter, Men Never Grow Up. I am not perfect, but I did not break up one of my marriages. My first husband was killed in an accident. He was a good man, but weak. The second told me he was single, but he had a wife. The third left to keep from paying his debts. Very truly yours, MRS. FRANKLYN PARKER YOUNG.

It's Fun to be Single Manchester, New Hampshire.

Dear Editors: What's all this uproar about getting a man? Why the frantic calls for help, the advice given by the bucketful in the magazine articles? How to be "date bait" in the perfume, hand-lotion, soap ads and all the rest?

It's fun to be single. Ask me! I've been single ever since I was born—twenty-nine years ago.

I earn an adequate salary. I'm largely my own boss in my job. There is something new and interesting in my life almost every day. To some women marriage is enough, but there is a group that can take it or leave it. When you consider that there are 600,000 divorces each year, that there are more married women than single ones earning money outside the home, and that more housewives than any other group have mental breakdowns, it doesn't look as though marriage was the answer to every woman's prayer.

With all the work that needs to be done, in a world where the gentleness of a woman is invaluable, why mourn about not finding a man? Give the poor things a rest. They must be tired from all the running they have to do, anyway.

Sincerely yours,
LUETTA RAMSEY.

Why Do Men Leave Home?

New York City.

Dear Editor: This is something a little new to me—writing a letter to the editor. Listen, chum, since when are men the super race? I have nothing against them whatsoever. But I do get tired of hearing the various psychologists criticizing the women continually for everything wrong with marriage.

Especially Prof. Clifford Adams. Never once have I read an article by him in which he told the men where to head in. I can see the background of women dominating him until he finally got wise and decided to stand on his own two feet. Then he decided to let them have it ever since. Will someone please write an article explaining marriage to the men?

Sincerely,
T. DUXBURY.

Religion in Schools

Wrentham, Massachusetts.

Dear Editors: The article Should Religion be Taught in our Schools, by Christian Gauss, is most interesting and timely. It points up the problems involved in this case which was decided strangely and ambiguously by the Supreme Court. Yet I am greatly opposed to the released-time religious-educational program as it has been set up.

I am not an atheist. Far from it! I am not opposed to religion in the schools. My position is that public-school time and public-school facilities should not be used to propagate Episcopalianism, or Methodism, or Catholicism, or Judaism, or Universalism. Sectarianism has no place in tax-supported education. But religion has.

We cannot say with absolute certainty that religion and early man made their advent together. But the preponderance of the evidence would seem to indicate that all sins have been religious and that human terrible things have been done in the name of religion, even Christian religion, men have always aspired to be better than they were. Men have always sought or fought a self-identification with a Purpose which was Good, which was above them, which was ever-present, and from which they could not escape. And going no farther than natural religion, this Force is called God. And God is quite as evident in the protestations of fanatical atheists as in the words of the most enthusiastic evangelist.

It is my personal belief, which I will [illegible] on no one, that God is inescapable and that true freedom and happiness begin with the acceptance of that belief. Jesus is an inspiration to all men, whether studied in a historical sense or in accordance with orthodox theology. No one is educated who knows nothing of Jesus. One secures inspiration from the study of the writings of Buddha, though he is so far removed from our tradition that we understand him with difficulty. St. Francis is a saint of all peoples. He didn't reform the world, but now hundreds of years later he still succeeds in making us feel ashamed of ourselves. Such is the power of religious men whose influence increases as the years go by, while that of their purely secular contemporaries lessens to the vanishing point.

Separating religion from education, public or private, is as impossible as securing a pound of flesh without taking a drop of blood. To deny, to ignore or to belittle the religious aspects, importance and history, relative to most any subject taught in the public schools, is to teach a lie and to actively propagate atheism. This is no more to be desired than the teaching of sectarian religion. Deliberately despiritualized education makes it possible for a child to rationalize himself into a belief that morals are apart from life, the concern only of fanatics. It gives him a ready excuse for a lack of self-discipline. A church or a sect may be denied or left; it is very difficult to withdraw from the human race. Sincerely yours,

LORRAINE N. NICHOLSON.

P.S. A bit controversial, eh? But you started it, you know.

Omit "Ladies' Home"?

Omaha, Nebraska.

Dear Editors: Why don't you leave out the words "Ladies' Home" instead of tormenting us readers by making them smaller each year? We all mean THE JOURNAL when we think of it. It's a wonderful magazine.

Sincerely yours,

T. F. ARMSTRONG.

Rood Luck

Indianapolis, Indiana.

Dear Sirs: I wondered, as I read, if your many readers could or would see the element of "luck" in the Rood story (How America Lives, August).

First of all, Henry Rood was lucky enough to have a family which fitted in "between" wars. Too young for World War I, too old for World War II, and their children too young to serve in the last war. And I believe everyone will agree with me that the war was the main thing which pushed farm prices up. And since the war has been over, the fact that we are feeding hungry and war-torn nations has kept them up.

So, how about us parents who had to give up our sons, just as they were beginning to be a help to us? Now that they are once more at home, married, and starting families of their own, they are not able to find a place to live, and because of the exorbitant prices for food, rentals, and so on, they have to hole up in one room. The ones who stayed home and prospered during the war, the ones who were always safe in their beds at night, had no worries except to get ahead while the getting was good.

Don't you honestly think that families like the Roods owe a lot to these boys? They give all credit to Extension, but Extension couldn't have helped them much if farm prices hadn't skyrocketed.

Sincerely,

MRS. D. M. DAVIS.

Army Needs Time

Northampton, Massachusetts.

Dear Editors: The article by Henry Pringle in the October JOURNAL is a much needed warning to the citizens of this country, that the success or failure of the draft lies in their hands. In this country nothing that touches so many people can be a success unless those in authority sell the idea to us in advance. It seems to me that the Department of the Army has rather oversold its experiment at Fort Knox. This article is a good antidote to too much optimism.

It seems to me, however, that Mr. Pringle is a little too pessimistic. Perhaps a medium ground between his pessimism and the optimism of the Army would be preferable. As General Bradley in a recent article remarked, they needed time, and so far the public had been willing to give him time in his major projects.

Cordially yours,
K. FRANCES SCOTT, M.D.
President, National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs.

Difficult to Understand

The Duke's Cottage, Rudgwick, England.

My dear Bruce and Beatrice: It is difficult for the average English person to understand the American political setup. All we know is that most of us certainly do envy Mr. Wallace. He has eggs and tomatoes THROWN at him, whereas the former we can't buy for any money here, and the latter we gladly pay half a crown a pound for.

This is the season of Forms. I have today got three rigmaroles each half a yard long, each containing over eighty questions about my crops, household employees, livestock, and what you will. This must be filled in in triplicate to account for my six hens, half a pig and one cow!

Later Princess Elizabeth will, no doubt, bring maternity once again right into fashion, so that even those ladies unable to enter for the stakes will wear the sort of clothes that make them look as if they might

Beware of Dry Skin

FROM ABOUT 25 ON—the natural oil that keeps skin soft and supple gradually decreases. Even before 40—a woman may lose as much as 20% of this oil skin needs.

Little signs warn when dry skin is creeping up on you. Watch for flaky spots—for tiny, dry lines. They say your skin needs more care—more oil.

Replacement help is at your fingertips with Pond's Dry Skin Cream. Three features make it extra softening. 1. Rich in lanolin—most like your own skin oil. 2. Homogenized to soak in better. 3. A softening emulsifier.

Arrests Dry Skin Two Ways:

Lanolin-Softens by Night—after your regular cleansing smooth rich-in-lanolin Pond's Dry Skin Cream generously over face. Leave a few minutes, then wipe off lightly so a soft film is left to help your skin all night. Your dry skin seems to "drink up" this rich cream. See how tiny dry lines are smoothed so they don't show.

Lanolin-Protects by Day—smooth on a very light touch of Pond's Dry Skin Cream before you make up. Protects your skin against dryness all day. Keeps your skin soft, smooth looking.

Mrs. Ellen Tuck Astor says:

"I'm never without this rich, softening cream"

Get this truly remarkable dry skin corrector—today! You'll find lanolin-rich Pond's Dry Skin Cream never leaves your skin sticky. Instead—it smooths on with a delicious softening feeling. Look out for Infectious Dandruff

LISTERINE Antiseptic and massage . . . it's a "must" with countless fastidious women who dread infectious dandruff with its ugly flakes and scales.

Wisely, they make Listerine Antiseptic and massage a part of regular hair-washing. It's a delightful way of guarding against this all-too-common condition.

You see, if the germs associated with infectious dandruff are present on hair and scalp, Listerine Antiseptic attacks them at once . . . kills them by millions. That includes the stubborn "Bottle Bacillus" (P. ovale) which many dermatologists say is a causative agent of infectious dandruff.

Get in the habit of using Listerine Antiseptic every time you wash your hair. It's a habit that can pay off in health and good looks. Try it and you'll see what we mean.

Listerine Antiseptic is the same antiseptic that has been famous for more than 60 years in the field of oral hygiene. Lambert Pharmacal Company, St. Louis, Mo.

AS RUSSIA SEES US

FOR the Russian reader, the magazine Ogonyok (Little Flame) published a summary and interpretation of The Sullivan Struggle in its June 27 issue. The story of Tom Sullivan, industrial worker, and his wife, Dorothy, and their four children was one of the How America Lives series which appeared last March in the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL. Without pulling punches, the JOURNAL writer described the difficulties of maintaining a family of six on the $2849.12 Tom Sullivan earned in 1947. The Russian correspondent, Ia. Gushchin, felt this would be of special interest to Russian readers.

The article in Little Flame begins:

> The presses of the American monopolies in their writings often pervert and varnish the life of toilers in the U. S. A. Even under such circumstances one may often catch a glimpse of the life of the toiling American that strikes close to the truth in a plump reactionary magazine. This occurs either for reasons connected with an election campaign or for other propaganda motives.

Pleasingly plump, that is. The Russian writer goes on to tell about the money troubles of the Sullivan family (which he blames on the ruthless exploitation of the capitalist system), constantly emphasizing that this family is economically an above-average representative of American workers. His thesis becomes clear when he says:

> The LADIES' HOME JOURNAL is a conservative reactionary magazine. It is by no means inclined to exaggerate the hardships of the life of American workers. The magazine attempts to portray the struggle of the Sullivans for existence as an eternal necessity, not the result of the capitalist system of exploitation. The magazine completely ignores the question: what will (Continued on Page 136)

The Affinity of War and Peace

By Dorothy Thompson

UNESCO was set up by the United Nations to fight war through influencing the human mind. "Since all war begins in the human mind, it is in the human mind that it must be abolished," says the statute founding the agency.

Behind that statement is the idea that war can be abolished by the conversion of sinful (warring) man to good (peaceful) man. It poses the opposites—War and Peace—and demands man take a stand on the side of the angels. In this concept war is wholly evil and peace wholly good.

Were this so, war, I am convinced, would have faded away long ago. But it is possible to accept this thesis only if every other value and virtue recognized by the instinct and morality of mankind were made subservient to the one virtue: peace. Courage, honesty, truth, charity, generosity, self-denial are virtues, as cravenness, deceit, greed and self-indulgence are vices. War is struggle, which the exercise of virtue by no means precludes, and struggle is inherent in life and growth. Thus, though peace is indivisible in our minds from virtue, virtue is not indivisible from struggle; and war, therefore, is not indivisible from peace.

Peace and war both represent man's paradoxical quest for the meaning of life, and for the creation and preservation of the societies fitting to his concept of that meaning and the aspirations arising from it.

There is a phrase in the Declaration of Independence which has always bothered me—as it bothered its author. It declares man's unalienable right to the "pursuit of happiness." It bothers me out of doubt whether happiness can ever be achieved by pursuing it. It would seem rather to be the earned though unanticipated and unsought-for by-product of pursuing other things, such as love, regarded more as giving than receiving; knowledge, as the route to wisdom; moderation, as a check on ambition and passion; truth, as the extension of perception; and work, as the more creative expression of one's nature. A man is happy when he is on relatively good terms with himself and his environment, and least happy when he feels called upon to ask himself concerning his happiness.

So, it seems to me, it is with peace. When people pursue peace and peace alone, they seem to end up only with appeasement—the giving away of their peace to others who are not pursuing it. When the world or a society is really at peace nobody even mentions the word "peace." Life seems to be unfolding more or less in harmony with natural law; struggle, though constant, is restrained by commonly held assumptions of proper behavior; even if brute force is invoked, combatants are restrained by common standards and restricted aims.

It is when peoples or classes no longer share any basic standards of virtue that the peace between them is threatened by destruction beyond hope of restoration. Then the struggle becomes fundamental. Under such conditions war may appear as virtue and peace as vice.

That is perhaps why the bitterest of wars have been religious wars, or quasi-religious wars in which secular ideas have taken on the compulsive force of a religion. The most dreadful European struggles have been of this sort: the great medieval crusades of the Christian passion against the Infidels; the terrible Thirty Years' War between Catholic and Protestant kings, which left Germany, its battleground, "with more wolves than men"; the Napoleonic Wars, which grew out of the French Revolution and were motivated by a passion to produce (or restrain) a new social order; the American Civil War, whose peculiar interest and passion were produced by the existence of slavery and horror at its extension; and World War II, whose passion was less against the Germans, as a people, than vehement aversion to the spreading of Nazism.

It is characteristic of such struggles that their lines are never wholly drawn along national frontiers, but are actually drawn in the minds of men. But the struggle that goes on in the human mind, in such great ideological crises, is not between war and peace, but between notions of good and evil, right and wrong.

Thomas Carlyle made the observation that "There is no passion of the mind of man but meets and masters the fear of death." War is not "murder," as some pacifists say it is. For murder is the removal of another person from life at no risk of one's own; it involves no concepts of virtue, and is usually the result of combinations of vices, while war is a struggle in which one's own life is as involved as the enemy's, and in which love and hate are equally engaged.

Men, therefore, paradoxically, fight their bitterest wars out of the deepest moral convictions or the most engrossing ideas. It is even true that in the human mind wars are often fought for "peace." Even Hitler had the idea that permanent peace could never be obtained until all the world was organized under one system and all force concentrated in a single hand, to police the world against further wars and rebellions. "The pacifist humane ideal would be excellent if first one man and one nation made itself master of the globe," he wrote.

The International Communists also believe that there can be no permanent peace until all the world is organized in one Marxian-Socialist system. In this mentality wars fought by "capitalist" powers are evil, but victorious wars fought by communist states further such a world system and therefore bring closer a permanently warless world.

On the other hand, those who believe with equal passion that it is neither possible nor desirable to restrain all mankind within one rigid set of ideas or one single system, holding that the immense differences of tradition, talent, challenge and opportunity among individuals and peoples point to diversity as a law of Nature and to totalitarianism of any kind as stagnation and decline, hope to achieve peace by legal and forceful restraints upon aggression. In their view only the certainty that aggression will be repulsed by overwhelming force is any guaranty of peace and liberty. But the forceful suppression of aggression is also war, though its object is the attainment of a warless world.

These and many other choices posed in the human mind are not choices between war and peace, but between good and evil. Millions of men who hate war have perennially decided that "it is better to die on one's feet than live on one's knees." Other millions, though deploring war, have exposed themselves and others to it out of conviction that the peace and prosperity of future generations depend upon the extermination by force of one social order and the creation of another, or the defense of one against another. Almost all men believe in the moral right and even duty of self-defense. The law exempts the individual from charges of violence when violence is employed in self-defense against an armed attack, and the United Nations seeks to outlaw "aggressive" war, not holding the defender equally guilty with the assaulter.

It therefore seems doubtful whether mere propaganda for "peace" accomplishes anything. War is one way by which men and nations defend what they consider good and resist what they consider evil, and it is not likely to be removed from the world—as long as men seek to distinguish right from wrong, which is their highest spiritual activity—unless an equivalent is found for it.

DEATH SPEAKS: There was a merchant in Bagdad who sent his servant to market to buy provisions and in a little while the servant came back, white and trembling, and said, "Master, just now when I was in the market place I was jostled by a woman in the crowd and when I turned I saw it was Death that jostled me. She looked at me and made a threatening gesture; now, lend me your horse, and I will ride away from this city and avoid my fate. I will go to Samarra and there Death will not find me." The merchant lent him his horse, and the servant mounted it, and he dug his spurs in its flanks and as fast as the horse could gallop he went. Then the merchant went down to the market place and he saw me standing in the crowd and he came to me and said, "Why did you make a threatening gesture to my servant when you saw him this morning?" "That was not a threatening gesture," I said, "it was only a start of surprise. I was astonished to see him in Bagdad, for I had an appointment with him tonight in Samarra."

—W. SOMERSET MAUGHAM.

In domestic civilized societies struggle, though constant, is restrained from naked force (war) by processes of law and effective instruments of peaceful change. He who feels himself wronged does not seize a pistol or a crowbar, but takes his case to court. But were there no court in whose judgment he had a degree, at least, of confidence, he could find no justice except by naked force. Those in rebellion against phases of the social order fight for the minds of their contemporaries through political instruments. Even this does not preclude all violence, but since force is on the side of the law, the victory or defeat of ideas is aimed, not at killing one's opponents but at changing the law and the lawmakers. As long as men have effective instruments, which their minds accept, for effecting or resisting change, they resort to such instruments. Conversely, they feel themselves justified in resort to force, in the absence of such instruments through which they can effectively struggle for what they conceive to be justice and the triumph of "right" ideas.

The problem of peace is not, therefore, the problem of eliminating the will to struggle. It is the problem of finding forms through which struggle can be canalized with the least destructive effects. All struggle is a form of war, bringing victories to some and defeats to others. None of it is painless.

But the unarmed struggles at least preserve that which man cannot restore once it is violently taken away—namely, the source of the struggle: life.

It is not, therefore, I think, the pursuit of "peace" which will lead us from war, but a deeper understanding of the nature of man, the recognition that struggle is a part of that nature, and that arenas that are not bloody battlefields must be provided for struggle. Perfect peace is total renunciation, and none except those rarest geniuses, spiritual saints, have ever found it this side of the grave. THE END

Why should anyone want to undertake the job of running the White House? A quick glance at WHITE HOUSE DIARY, written by Mrs. Henrietta Nesbitt, F.D.R.'s housekeeper, would put off any woman we know, and after all Mrs. Nesbitt was only second in command (or third). "Things will quiet down after Easter," Mrs. Roosevelt told her at the start of '37. And by April, in the post-Lenten season alone, Mrs. Nesbitt had listed 10,000 people entertained.

Then there were the diets (and these days you can't count on Republicans' not having nervous stomachs). Jimmy Roosevelt had an ulcer diet, Secretary Hull had to have lettuce, boiled chicken, tomato, green vegetables only, white bread, butter, milk and Swiss cheese. Secretary Morgenthau couldn't touch beef or white bread. There were 22 items "not to be taken" in Lord Tweedsmuir's diet, and Harry Hopkins was on a low-fat, high-protein, high-caloric, bland diet. Even Fala had a diet—because of his spotting the President's rug. Every once in a while the President himself blew up about food. "You'll just have to be patient," Mrs. Roosevelt would tell Mrs. Nesbitt, "the President is in a tizzy." "He has his Dutch up," Doctor McIntyre would say, and then the three of them would get together on trying to please.

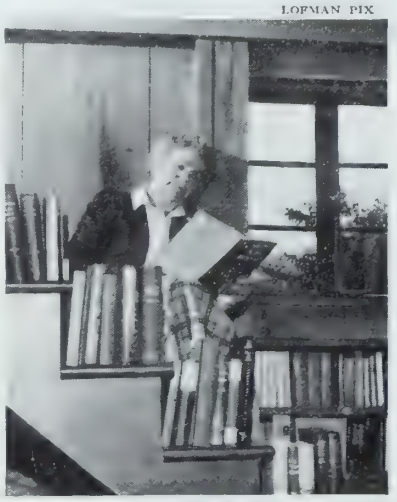
The White House dogs didn't make things any easier. Once a newspaper woman bent over Cricky, Mrs. Roosevelt's old deaf Scottie, and Cricky bit her on the lip. Smart dog. And Major, the President's police dog, on the occasion of a very special trip of Mackenzie King from Canada, bit the Prime Minister on the hand, which was not so smart.

Then there were the ants. "We always had ants in the fall along with the official functions." And cockroaches and rats and squirrels. But these were as nothing compared with the moths. "Apparently there is only one cure for moths, and that is to burn them."

Mrs. Nesbitt was pretty annoyed at what the newspapers had to say about food in the White House. "Liver and beans three days in a row," said the papers, "and the same salt fish for breakfast four days hand running." Every murmur of the President became news and was flashed around the world. But "You have to be patient," Mrs. Roosevelt told her again. What annoyed Mrs. Nesbitt most, however, was the news photographs of her beloved Mrs. Roosevelt—"they couldn't show her queenliness and kindliness, and the deep, warm, human friendliness"—but Mrs. Roosevelt told her that after all one had to be philosophical about pictures.



Silk spreads were on all the White House beds except the President's. He used seersucker because he liked his books and papers with his breakfast, and the children climbed up, and Fala.

Maybe Republican presidents will be more tidy, but how can any woman resist such a book?

Longer and Happier Lives

by MARGARET HICKEY

NEW medical and scientific knowledge has made possible for us longer and more useful lives. The average life expectancy today is from 20 to 25 years longer than it was a quarter of a century ago. Yet many of us as individuals are not getting ready for these added years, and very few communities are prepared to help elder-agers fight loneliness and to find new friends and interests.

Today there are more than 10,000,000 people over 65 years of age in the United States. Of these, 2,367,597 are receiving old-age assistance from the Government. Another 2,162,693 persons are benefiting from the insurance features of Social Security legislation. These plans, however, do not cover millions who have worked in agriculture, domestic service and small businesses. Even when personal savings and help from their children provide adequate food and shelter, our senior citizens often suffer from tragic loneliness.

Many older people need, and are capable of holding, jobs. The attitude of employers toward age, however, excludes the very individuals to whom science has granted extra years of usefulness. During the war years, they served in part-time and even in full-time employment. However, employers again are saying, "Old people are queer," or "They have irritating habits." But Dr. George Lawton, author of Women Go to Work at Any Age, writes, "It isn't the gray hair nor the birthdays that block the way, but the unwillingness to learn." The Altrusa Clubs, with a national membership of busy women executives, will use this guide in their efforts to lessen employer prejudice about age and to help older workers master new and more efficient work habits.

One of the pioneers in salvaging the talents of older people was Dr. Lillien J. Martin. She retired at the age of 65 as Professor of Psychology at Stanford University and opened a clinic in San Francisco. During the remaining 27 years of her life, she helped thousands overcome emotional poverty and economic insecurity. Today her clinics have branches in Los Angeles and New York City.

In Great Britain the Women's Voluntary Services, under Lady Reading, are helping to house, feed and care for elderly men and women. Hot nourishing meals are taken from central kitchens to invalids and elderly people in their own homes. By the end of March, 1948, 9000 meals were being delivered each week to old people in 119 different areas. Similar care could be provided in this country with the help of volunteers, visiting nurses and housekeepers.

Special community services for our elderly neighbors are greatly needed. The tasks of the volunteer can be simple, but highly important and rewarding ones. In Chicago the volunteer Friendly Visiting Corps of the Council of Social Agencies offers training courses for volunteers who choose to work with older people. They read to those with failing eyesight, drop in for a friendly chat, or just provide a sympathetic audience for the man or woman who wants a chance to talk.

The National Jewish Welfare Board has developed new program aids for its "golden age" centers in St. Louis, Indianapolis, and in the Chicago Jewish Community Centers. Cleveland's Benjamin Rose Institute pioneered in promoting a model program there. In Hartford, Connecticut, the Business and Professional Women's Club devotes a part of each Sunday to driving older people to the country, taking them out to Sunday dinners, or remembering birthdays and anniversaries. In St. Paul, Minnesota, the Council of Social Agencies has a special committee on older people working with the settlement houses. In many communities, the Red Cross chapter includes services to the aged as a part of its volunteer services. THE END

AN amazing thing happened to Mrs. Johnson after her husband died. She was 82, a white-haired little lady who had led a busy life bringing up two children, living in Philadelphia with the man she loved. She had never made many friends, never spent much time knitting or reading books. "Goodness," she said once, "there's no time with a man and children to look after." But now Mrs. Johnson had no one to look after but herself. Her son and daughter lived in Kansas City, and while she could have moved out there, she decided to stay on in the gray shingled row house which had sheltered so much of her family life.

Mrs. Johnson hadn't thought it would be easy to live alone, but she hadn't realized, either, just how incredibly lonely a person can get with no one to talk to, nothing to look forward to except an occasional visit to the grocer, or church on Sunday. Always reserved and shy anyway, Mrs. Johnson found herself withdrawing more and more from the world. "It's wrong," she thought, "but what can I do? I'm too old to make new friends. My life is over."

Then it happened. The postman, instead of walking right past as he usually did, was coming up the walk. In his hand, a post card from the neighborhood Settlement House inviting Mrs. Johnson to come over Monday afternoon and help form a club with friends her own age. Mrs. Johnson was excited for the first time in many months. Maybe this club would bring something new into her life.

The club has indeed meant something to Mrs. Johnson—that isn't her real name, but she's a very real person—and to 2049 others over 65 like her, who each week lock their loneliness in their rooms while they have fun together in Philadelphia's 43 clubs for oldsters. Club members come from all parts of the city, from all economic and cultural backgrounds. They speak many different languages—Polish, Russian, Yiddish. They are many colors and creeds. Some are intellectuals. Others have had little or no formal education. Some have private incomes. More are living on as little as $40 a month. Sometimes men and women attend the same meetings; others meet with members of their own sex only.

But for all these people the club has meant the same thing—new friends, new hobbies, new points of view. "When I met (Continued on Page 241)

MAKING MARRIAGE WORK

Love grows up with marriage, but every marriage has its growing pains.

BY CLIFFORD R. ADAMS
Ph.D., The Pennsylvania State College, Department of Psychology

WHAT HAPPENS TO ROMANCE?

AT the time they marry, most people expect to be happy ever after. In their minds, the wedding marks not the end of romance but the real beginning. They are confident that the routine demands of everyday existence will never dull their affection, nor crises mar their serenity; as for petty annoyances, they anticipate none at all.

Yet at the end of a year, the intense awareness of happiness which illumined the wedding day may have already begun to fade, and during the next few years it is likely to diminish still more. Does this mean that the average marriage, even if it lasts, is still a disappointment? What happens as the years pass?

Summarizing the experience of several hundred married couples participating in our continuing marriage-research project, we can describe the typical development of married happiness this way:

During the first year, and as it should, some of the glamour disappears. The couple are sobered by a new appreciation of the responsibilities of marriage as they face problems of housing, budgeting and the prospect of a baby. The marriage is still very happy, but husband and wife have less time to think about it as they become increasingly absorbed in the realities of earning a living and maintaining a home.

Another year goes by. The baby absorbs the attention of both parents, dislocates the budget and radically alters the household routine. Husband and wife have less time for each other, or to take part in joint social activities.

And the third year is harder. Little luxuries are a thing of the past, and even necessities require anxious planning. The wife's clothes are shabby, and she can't avoid some resentment of her confining routine.

But the fourth year promises to be better, and so it proves to be. The husband has a raise, they are out of debt, and can begin to buy some of the things they've done without. The household runs more smoothly, for the wife is a better cook and housekeeper, and the youngster is more self-sufficient. They are happily looking forward to the arrival of another baby.

The fifth year is another tough one, for it brings new budget trouble. To the expense of the new baby is added the cost of services the wife no longer has time to perform. The cost of living is rising, and the wife's wardrobe is now practically threadbare. She has less freedom than ever. Altogether, this is a year to be lived through.

During the sixth year, some of their friends get divorces. But things are slightly easier for our couple, and, in any case, the idea of divorce has never tempted them.

Then the seventh year begins. It is the toughest yet. In addition to everything else, their personal relationship is not so close as it was, for the husband has a more demanding job, and his wife is necessarily more and more absorbed in the children.

But as the eighth year begins, things are again much smoother. To be sure, little is left of the hopes and dreams, the romance and glamour of the honeymoon. But in their place, the couple have built a solid foundation for marriage. Through shared experience, co-operation and understanding, their romantic attachment has developed into enduring love.

What if Jim is growing gray and a little stout, if Mary looks definitely matronly in her last year's suit? These two have insight enough to be thankful for the present, instead of pining for the past. Yes, they miss the dancing and the parties, the gaiety of youth, but they have discovered new pleasures in their own home and family. Hard as these years have been, they would live them over again if need be. Their marriage has not turned out just as they expected, but it is far from being a failure.

Some marriages, of course, are happier than this. But our story is based on what happens to the average couple, not to the exceptional.

If your story sounds like the one we have told, your experience is not tragic but typical. Face the fact that, since people are not perfect, marriage cannot be either. You have been discouraged before, and you undoubtedly will be again.

But, if you two really love each other, if you have faith in yourselves and in the future, if you are convinced that your marriage will not fail and determined that it shall not—then you can look forward to increasing mature happiness.

WHEN YOUR HUSBAND'S AWAY

OCCASIONAL short "vacations from marriage" may be good for both husbands and wives. But most couples would agree that frequent or prolonged separations are undesirable. The desire for companionship is one of the most compelling reasons for marrying. Clearly, this desire cannot be fully satisfied if husband and wife must be separated very long or very often.

Yet many couples, even in peacetime, are forced by circumstances to spend much of their time apart. Separations occasioned by emergencies—the illness of a relative, the difficulty of finding a home, the husband's transfer to another city—while they may be prolonged, can usually be regarded as temporary interruptions in the normal routine. But in other households, usually because of the husband's work, separations for a large share of the time are a normal condition of the couple's married life.

How does such separation affect a couple's chances of married happiness? Though inevitably it diminishes the day-to-day enjoyment of life, it need not and sometimes does not affect the basic relationship at all.

This fact was brought out in a study of the married happiness of several hundred couples, about half of whom had been separated for various reasons (including military service) and for various periods of time, and about half of whom had never been separated. The study identified the attitudes and common-sense precautions which had helped those couples whose married happiness survived the test of separation. On the basis of their experience, a few suggestions can be offered for others confronted by the same situation:

- Instead of feeling sorry for yourself, recognize that separation creates a hardship for you both. Accept it as a practical problem and devise measures to meet it.

- Develop an interest of your own to occupy your leisure when your husband is away. Hours spent in melancholy idleness will not add to your happiness, nor will they enhance your personality.

- Keep in close touch by mail, daily if possible. Through letters, you and your husband can keep informed not only of happenings of interest to both but of each other's thoughts and feelings. But don't complain if your husband can't always write as often as you do.

- Take every opportunity to be together. Perhaps you can accompany your husband occasionally, even if it means some disruption at home. And when he is there, arrange your schedule to have the maximum time with him.

- You two must have faith in each other. Under any circumstances, it's hard to overcome suspicion and distrust on the part of either husband or wife; if the couple is separated, it's almost impossible.

A marriage that would have succeeded otherwise is not often disrupted by separation alone. A couple that cannot stand the strain of spending some of their days apart probably could not stand the strain of spending all their lives together. If your marriage is shaky, search for and try to eliminate other disrupting factors before deciding that separation is the sole and irremediable difficulty.

Are You Realistic?

Few people can be happy in either job or marriage unless they are willing to face reality. Read each question very carefully before answering "Yes" or "No."

1. Do you believe men are more intelligent than women?
2. In triangles, are all three people partially responsible?
3. Are you sure that people are born with consciences?
4. Can love be destroyed by neglect or disregard?
5. When faced with a hard day, do you do the easiest chores first?
6. Is a wife more responsible for a happy marriage than a husband?
7. Would you be a different person if you could move time back?
8. Is enduring love more like friendship than romance?
9. Do facts, rather than feelings, influence most behavior?
10. In living a life, is experience more valuable than education?
11. Do you believe we will have war within three years?
12. If fire breaks out, do you know the exact number to call?
13. Would you rather charge purchases than pay cash?
14. Do you vote in both primary and general elections?
15. Are most persons' actions largely unselfish in nature?
16. Do you always shop around before finally buying?
17. Can a couple own a pleasure car on a $50-a-week income?
18. Do you feel most people are honest and trustworthy?
19. Is it important that a man be at least three years older than his wife?
20. Do you regularly save some part of your income?

All odd-numbered questions should be answered No, all even-numbered questions Yes. If your total score is 17 or more, you are a down-to-earth person, quite practical and realistic in your thinking. A score of 14 is average. With a score of 11 or less, you are probably swayed entirely too much by your emotions and have considerable difficulty dealing with personal problems.

DO YOU AGREE?

Why do people write anonymous notes? A recent one to my husband has brought us much anguish.

Jealousy, anger, revenge, envy, deep inferiority and feelings of failure—especially the two last—are the basic causes. Poisonous and intellectually dishonest as such notes are, try to remember that the poor devil who is writing them is usually insecure and neurotic.

"What's My Trouble?"

DOWN in the dumps with another case of the blues? If these sad-sack symptoms turn up too often it may mean that you're another victim of one of the most common of all teen-aged ailments, the kind of trouble that hits everyone at least once in a high-school lifetime along with a case of unrequited love, a crush on Richard Widmark and an occasional siege of bad complexion. It's an ailment commonly called "inferiority complex," and few girls get through high school without it! It can make life about as grim, hopeless and full of troubles as a morning radio serial. And that's when this feeling called "inferiority complex" can be serious!

Just What Does it Mean?... By definition, "an inferiority complex is the feeling that one is more inferior than one really is, and thus keeps thinking he is no good and will fail." You say that's an old and familiar feeling with you? It's that sinking sensation that hits you every time Johnnie passes you by to ask Marie to dance the fast numbers, whenever you get on the diving board at the school pool or even when you overhear someone else's being asked for a date for a big evening while you're still waiting and hoping? Or is it that panicky feeling that strikes you right in the middle of your cashmere sweater every time you are called on to recite in history class, when you try to do a scene from Dorothy Parker as tryout for the dramatic club, or when you bounce in the front door after school and find you're faced with mother and visiting bridge club? Well, let's not get things confused. A little nervousness, a little of that "I hope I do all right" concern is a natural and healthy thing, especially for high-school fellows and girls who are learning to act as individuals for almost the first time. But that feeling is not an inferiority complex. You're just a normal gal having a few normal shakes and shivers about the troubles of growing up.

Is it Catching? . . . Take the case of Janie S., for instance. People who didn't know her well thought her an out-and-out snob; her girl friends (or at least they pretended to be her friends) would have told you that she had a superiority complex, if anything. Janie's clothes were always just right, her schoolwork was always done on time, and if anyone was asked to volunteer for committee duty or extra library work, Janie was right there with her hand up, prim and proper. She dated occasionally; all the boys thought she was "a nice kid, but ——" and stood in awe of suggesting anything except a Saturday-night malted-and-movie or a date for a school dance six weeks away. Above all, Janie was a "lady," one of the snob mob. She never took part in school sports, class dramatics or crazy fun like football bonfires or dressing in hobo costume for the Halloween party. She was polite to everyone, but had only two close girl friends and never, never thought of spending time with anyone outside "her crowd." But in her heart, Janie wasn't really having fun. She had a type of inferiority complex—she was afraid to "try." She wanted to be a good sport, relax and do a little clowning around, but she didn't know how. Maybe as a child she had been the good-little-girl type who never scuffed her shoes, lost her hair bows or wrinkled her stiff, starched dress. Anyway, she never learned to play, to join others in fun until she got into high school and realized the good times she was missing. Then she got the bright idea that instead of being "better" than the other girls, maybe she was just being stuffy and dull. And since you can't get over an inferiority complex by pretending to be superior, Janie made up her mind to forget the snob stuff and mingle with the crowd, instead of just her crowd. And what happened? Chalk one up for Janie—because she is a swell kid now!

Any Sure Cure?... Or take the strange story of Julie B. She was a sixteen-year-old sophomore who was always singing the blues to the indigo tune of "I've got a feeling I'm failing." But hers was an aggressive inferiority complex. She wanted so much to be popular and a favorite with everyone that she tried too hard to please. Julie could make friends quickly and then lose them just as fast by demanding too much of their time, passing on a bit of gossip or saying unkind things behind their backs. If she heard about a hay ride or a party at Mary Smith's without an invitation for Julie, she was in for a spell of the blues. Yet Julie never made plans for fun herself, but just "hung around" insisting she be included in everyone else's good times. Dates were few and far between, because one Coke-and-chatter evening and Julie promptly marked that boy as her permanent and steady fella—and was heartbroken if he didn't call at least four times the next day. Low grades in history came, not because she just didn't work hard, but because "the teacher had it in for me." Little-sister troubles started at home, not because Julie was selfish or self-centered, but because "that little brat is always trying to bother me." Her spirits were always way up in the clouds or way down in the dumps, until one day she made up her own mind that it was time to grow up. She convinced herself that she disliked this habit of an inferiority complex and that she wanted to behave differently. She realized that while she was criticizing other people, she was subconsciously finding excuses for not criticizing herself. So what happened? She began to train herself to think each day not "Am I the most popular, did I come out best?" but "Did I try and did I have fun?" And what happened? You guessed it—Julie had fun!

How About Me?... And the last case is the saddest because, in high school, it's the most common and the solution is the hardest to find. Barbara B. had the type of deep inferiority complex that was with her all the time, left her just waiting to be hurt. She was the kind of shy gal of whom others shrugged and said, "Just a schmoe, you know," and never even tried to find out any more about her. For at fifteen, Barbara was convinced she was a complete and permanent flop and behaved accordingly. She had no close friends, never joined the crowd, never even tried to "belong" to any clubs or school groups and spent most of her time day-dreaming or brooding about herself. Often she pretended to be all wrapped up in her schoolwork, too busy to make friends. Usually she was withdrawn, resentful —and secretly longing to have fun like the other girls. And she was just too sensitive to listen to anyone, even her mother, about how she might improve herself. With Barbara, as with most cases, the cure wasn't quick and easy. It just happened that one day a boy said hello to her in math class, and she was so surprised that from that day on she resolved to be different. In the back of her mind she pinned up a clear picture of the type of girl she'd like to be—friendly, well groomed and easy to talk to—and then, little by little, worked toward that ideal. For instance, it took her six months and buckets of eggnogs, but she gained eight pounds—and in all the right places! Her hair never did look like something out of Hollywood, but she had it cut short and was amazed to find it curled by itself. She wasn't elected class president, but she did get to be head of the bulletin-board committee in civics class. She didn't (even for the sake of a good story!) collect three class rings, a Hi-Y pin and a letter sweater, but she did get to be good friends with a girl who had a brother coming home from college for Christmas! And most important, she realized that any personality changes had to begin right in her own little head. . . . For more information, ask Barbara B. She's a whiz at conversation now!

The secret is the NEW "LIFETIME" OXYDOL!

OXYDOL

Fifty Years Ago in the Journal

IN November, 1898, a gas explosion wrecked the Supreme Court room, race riots broke out in Wilmington, and the longest telephone line in the world (2600 miles) was completed between Austin, Texas, and Bar Harbor, Maine. Teddy Roosevelt was elected Governor of New York and the song Let Me Shake the Hand that Shook the Hand of Sullivan was born.

And in November, 1898, the JOURNAL celebrated its fifteenth birthday. "Its 48 pages are bought by 850,000 people, and it crosses every sea and ocean," proudly remarks Editor Bok. He adds, "Some people are complaining about its unwieldy size."

"Do not drink ice water," warns Ruth Ashmore in Sidetalks with Girls. "It shocks your stomach, breaks the enamel on your teeth, and where a girl happens to have a weak heart, causes her to faint by its coldness."

Prize Dollar Dinners reveal that eggs cost 12 cents a dozen fifty years ago; leg of lamb, 9 cents a pound; milk, 5 cents a quart; and a whole frying chicken, 8 cents.

"The largest salary paid to any man in the United States is not known," Editor Bok advises a reader. "Men do not discuss their salaries for the benefit of the public."

Fashion note: "Instead of the all-black hats, so long in vogue for bridesmaids, yellow is now selected."

Visiting cards: "When a card is folded through the center it means the visitor wishes to see all the ladies of the house. If one corner of the card is bent over it signifies that the visitor is leaving town."

"Seamen in U. S. Navy are paid according to grade: ordinary seamen, $19 per month; seamen of the first class, $24 per month."

Beauty care: "For the hands that have become tanned or sunburnt, dabble them with lemon juice. After the third night's care, they will be as fair and soft as any of Shakespeare's heroines'."

"A nursery governess," according to the JOURNAL, "must be a person of high culture, not too young. At the table she must watch the children continually and quietly, and after leaving the table remind the children of any fault committed, and deprive them of some pleasure because of their bad manners."

"Matinee bags are only large enough to hold opera glasses, a handkerchief and a smelling bottle."

Journal About Town

CRONER-HELBURN

At the National Horse Show, which opens Manhattan's fall social season, even the judges are full-dressed for the occasion.

IN a couple of days five hundred of the finest horses in the country will be stabled in the basement of Madison Square Garden, ready for the National Horse Show to open the local social season, as it has been doing now since 1883, the first full-dress function of the fall. The horses are supposed to be the main attraction, and as a matter of fact they are, but don't underestimate the power of women's finery to capture the headlines and claim all kinds of attention; though nothing could possibly surpass the formal perfection of the men's attire—even those who judge the horses in the ring, with tanbark flying in all directions. We remember the judge who, unable to make up his mind which of two hunters was the better horse, decided to ride each one himself—white tie, top hat, tails and all. A great rider in any garb, he gave the first horse a good workout; the second, however, spilled him; but with a split tailcoat, dented topper and dirty face, he went right on judging. It didn't seem funny, either; it seemed rather fine, in the best tradition, like the whole Horse Show—dressy or not.

Ruth Mary Packard has been looking behind the scenes of the display-window-mannequin setup here, and of course ran right away into Florence Ferman, who makes most of the mannequins you see from Fifth Avenue to Hollywood Boulevard, and who looks like a mannequin herself. Tells Miss P. the old wax figures were pretty much just something to hold clothes, whereas she thinks of her figures as real people; even gives them names, along with all kinds of poses, such as ballet, skating, fixing their hair, lying down, leaning over and reaching up. You get the basic figure, which weighs twenty pounds, for anywhere from $125 to $165, and can buy as many extra arms and wigs as you like. She says the average life is about three years, after which they need a good going-over—plenty of sandpapering, repainting, restyling. "And you can't imagine," she said, "how glad I always am to see them again."

In order that Wilhela Cushman might create this month's cover before leaving for the Paris collections, Hattie Carnegie made the four-cornered velvet beret overnight, in the particular shade of cherry red which Wilhela wanted; while in a busy factory was duplicated Adele Simpson's idea for a silver-fox scarf with red velvet chou. A week later, in France, Wilhela found velvet hats and velvet trimmings one of the important fashions of the Paris openings.

Sometime in August the hundred millionth motor vehicle came off somebody's assembly line (they can't tell whose), and this month in Detroit the Automobile Manufacturers' Association will celebrate the event with the biggest dinner in the history of the motorcar. If Mr. R. E. Olds can come, he'll be the oldest famous figure at the party, but he's 84, and isn't sure he can make it. However, another oldster will be there to make a speech; the man who has probably invented more improvements to automobiles than anyone else alive: C. F. Kettering, of course, who is frequently referred to as the man whose invention of the self-starter "liberated the women." At least, it is claimed that in 1911, when this boon was perfected, women in droves began to drive, and women's age-long ankle-length skirts finally began to be shortened. Otherwise they couldn't have operated the pedals.

Can a woman be happy who has given her heart to one man and her life to another? The Journal's complete-in-one-issue condensed novel

By Anne Goodwin Winslow

"COUNT ANDREA reminds me so much of Colonel Bodley, at home," Mrs. Howard said, sitting down on the stone bench beside her nephew Roderick. It was on a little terrace halfway up from the garden and was seldom passed by those ascending without this sort of pause, this restful turning to admire the view. The garden at this hour was in shadow, but the Mediterranean was still bright.

Roderick, who had been sitting with a book, closed it and gave her his attention. He wanted to hear about Colonel Bodley; the people and things "at home," of which something here was continually reminding his aunt, were always interesting to him, though the region in which they were located was an unfamiliar one. Roderick had not been "at home" since his early childhood, and Mrs. Howard was really his great-aunt.

"You mean he looks like him?" he asked her.

"That, too, a little," Mrs. Howard said. "But I was really thinking of how he liked to go into things—and to pull everybody else in after him. I hate to think of how many things I might never have known if it hadn't been for Colonel Bodley."

"What sort of things?" Roderick inquired.

"Well, of course he was not as—we used to call it 'cultured'—as Count Andrea; but I believe he could have translated the inscription on that boy down there into English better than we have—the two of us working together. If it really is Latin and not just Italian. Gelida atque ardenta poma. It sounds funny, somehow."

"It isn't very good Latin," Roderick said. "Most inscriptions aren't."

"Well, 'cold and hot apples' isn't good either—not in any language, it seems to me. But Count Andrea won't mind its being bad English. We are trying to turn it into a poem," she said, dropping her eyes again to that more distant profile of rocks and sea—the perpetual enchantment. These children never seemed to notice it; all that beauty was what they saw from any window, any day. It was home, the deep well of their remembrance. And what did she see?

A garden, at any rate. And nobody could say the garden at home was not beautiful too, though it was certainly different from this one. There were no fountains, (Continued on Page 149)

GOD and the AMERICAN

, PENNSYLVANIA, PAINTED BY JOHN SHARP

The majority of people view hell as a repository for others only.

"Without love of God all human love between person and person is frustrated by man's love of himself."

"I suppose there is something after death—won't be gold streets though."

Most of the American people put national or political allegiance above religious conviction.

PEOPLE

What do Americans believe? How fervent are their beliefs? Do they live according to their faith? • BY LINCOLN BARNETT

"FOR it is not to be doubted that the duration of this life is but a moment," observed the French philosopher Blaise Pascal, "that the state of death is eternal, whatever may be its nature, and that thus it is impossible to take one step with sense and judgment unless we regulate our course by that point which ought to be our ultimate end."

In these words Pascal indicated the moral force underlying western civilization. Anyone who believes, as Pascal did, that his life touches a reality higher than the world of nature he perceives about him cannot be governed by instinct or material need alone. He will weigh his acts and motives against a standard of behavior imposed on him not by society, but from beyond.

The significance of this principle is accented right now by the great conflict between east and west. For the issues that separate the Communist states from this nation and its allies go deeper than politics or economics.

Most Americans doubtless see the cold war in terms used recently by Charles E. Wilson, president of the General Electric Company and co-chairman of the National Conference of Christians and Jews, who described the present struggle as a contest between "the God-fearing power of democracy and the God-hating power of Communism."

Not all Americans, however, understand the full implications of this phrase. Man's political forms and economic behavior are shaped by what he believes. Thus democracy, with its reverence for the individual conscience, is a product of religious ethics; it presupposes that religion will anticipate the state in restraining man's natural aggression and self-will. On the other hand any government that rejects the moral sanctions of religion has to employ other means of maintaining social order. Inevitably, history shows, the irreligious state is a police state.

Although Plato held that no nation can be really strong without belief in God, the accuracy of this idea may seem arguable today. Superficially the non-God-fearing U.S.S.R. appears to be very strong indeed—how strong no outside observer can say. What may be more valuable, however, than to conjecture about Russia, is to investigate the interior fiber of our own society.

In the conviction that a factual picture of the spiritual substructure of our democracy is vital to any understanding of current problems, the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL has sponsored a nationwide survey designed to assess the intensity of religious faith in the United States and the degree to which it governs the ethics and behavior of the American people today.

The survey falls into three levels of inquiry: What do Americans believe? How fervent are their beliefs? Do they live according to their faith?

To obtain this information a complex series of questions was evolved, and submitted, in personal interviews, by Gallup-poll methods, to a cross section of Americans from coast to coast. Then in order to ensure a broad and nondenominational interpretation of the returns, they were presented for analysis to three noted theologians: the Rev. Reinhold Niebuhr, professor of applied Christianity at Union Theological Seminary; the Rev. Simon Greenberg, professor of homiletics and acting provost of the Jewish Theological Seminary; and the Rev. George B. Ford, formerly Catholic adviser at Columbia, now rector of Corpus Christi Church in New York City.

I

Before trying to untangle the subtler relationships of religion and ethics, it is necessary first to find out what people think they believe. American public opinion is singularly united on the fundamental matter of belief in God. To the question "Do you believe in God?" 95 per cent of the American people answered "Yes." Of the rest, only 2 per cent classified themselves as atheists by replying with an unequivocal "No"; another 2 per cent chose the agnostic's "I don't know"; and 1 per cent declined to answer.

It is notable that no appreciable differences appeared in the ratio of men to women in these responses, or in breakdowns by geographical area or educational level. The only sizable variation is one that poets knew about long before national-opinion polls were invented: God's presence is sensed more acutely in the country than in crowded cities.

With respect to religious activity, 76 per cent of the people described themselves as church members, and 41 per cent said that they attend church "regularly." To the question "Do you ever pray?" 90 per cent of the people answered "Yes," 56 per cent specifying "Frequently."

A more definitive question asked people if they had thought about God or religion *during the preceding 24 hours. Unexpectedly 74 per cent replied that they had. And to a question of degree of feeling, "How much comfort and support do you, yourself, get from religion?" 53 per cent replied "a lot," and another 28 per cent said "a fair amount."

How many critics of our materialistic culture would have suspected that ninety-five adult Americans in every hundred believe in God, or that in an average day three quarters of the American people think about Him? All three of the churchmen to whom the returns were shown expressed surprise at these high ratios.

From this primary stage of the survey, a basic conclusion can be drawn—the religious potential in the United States is very great at this time. Its quality and active influence on American life are, however, not so obvious. (Continued on Page 230)

The average American's religious thinking has not advanced beyond the Sunday-school level.

There is a profound gulf between America's avowed ethical standards and observable realities.

A Week end .. is not Enough

Lucy knew that this was the moment when any woman should say NO.

THEY sat at a table for two tucked beneath a window. They were as handsome a young couple as could be found in the dining room of the Golden Horn Inn: the girl particularly young and honey-blond; the man dark, serious, somewhat older. They were obviously very fond of each other. Honeymooners, the other diners speculated.

They appreciated the table the waiter had chosen for them; off to one side by a window, it set them apart as if they were special people, not to be disturbed. They were, they had decided once and for all on the drive down. Even the weather was on their side, and it promised to hold out for the week end. They had driven down in the clear, blue October afternoon, the trees a bit faded from the long Indian summer that would surely end after Sunday. It had lasted too long, been too perfect, not to end soon now. Earlier in the week Lucy had wondered what they would do if it should rain Friday; it would be no fun in the country in the rain. But she knew it wouldn't rain really, the weather would have to hold out for them. And kindly enough, the weather had.

"Pretty nice," Vic said. It was hard to tell whether he meant her or the room. Both, Lucy supposed, meeting his look. How warmly blue his eyes were just now. "We've had luck all the way," he said.

She sat smiling, feeling no need to answer.

"We should have arrived at Alice's by now," he surmised.

She glanced at her watch. "We couldn't have made it yet. It was seventy-five more miles."

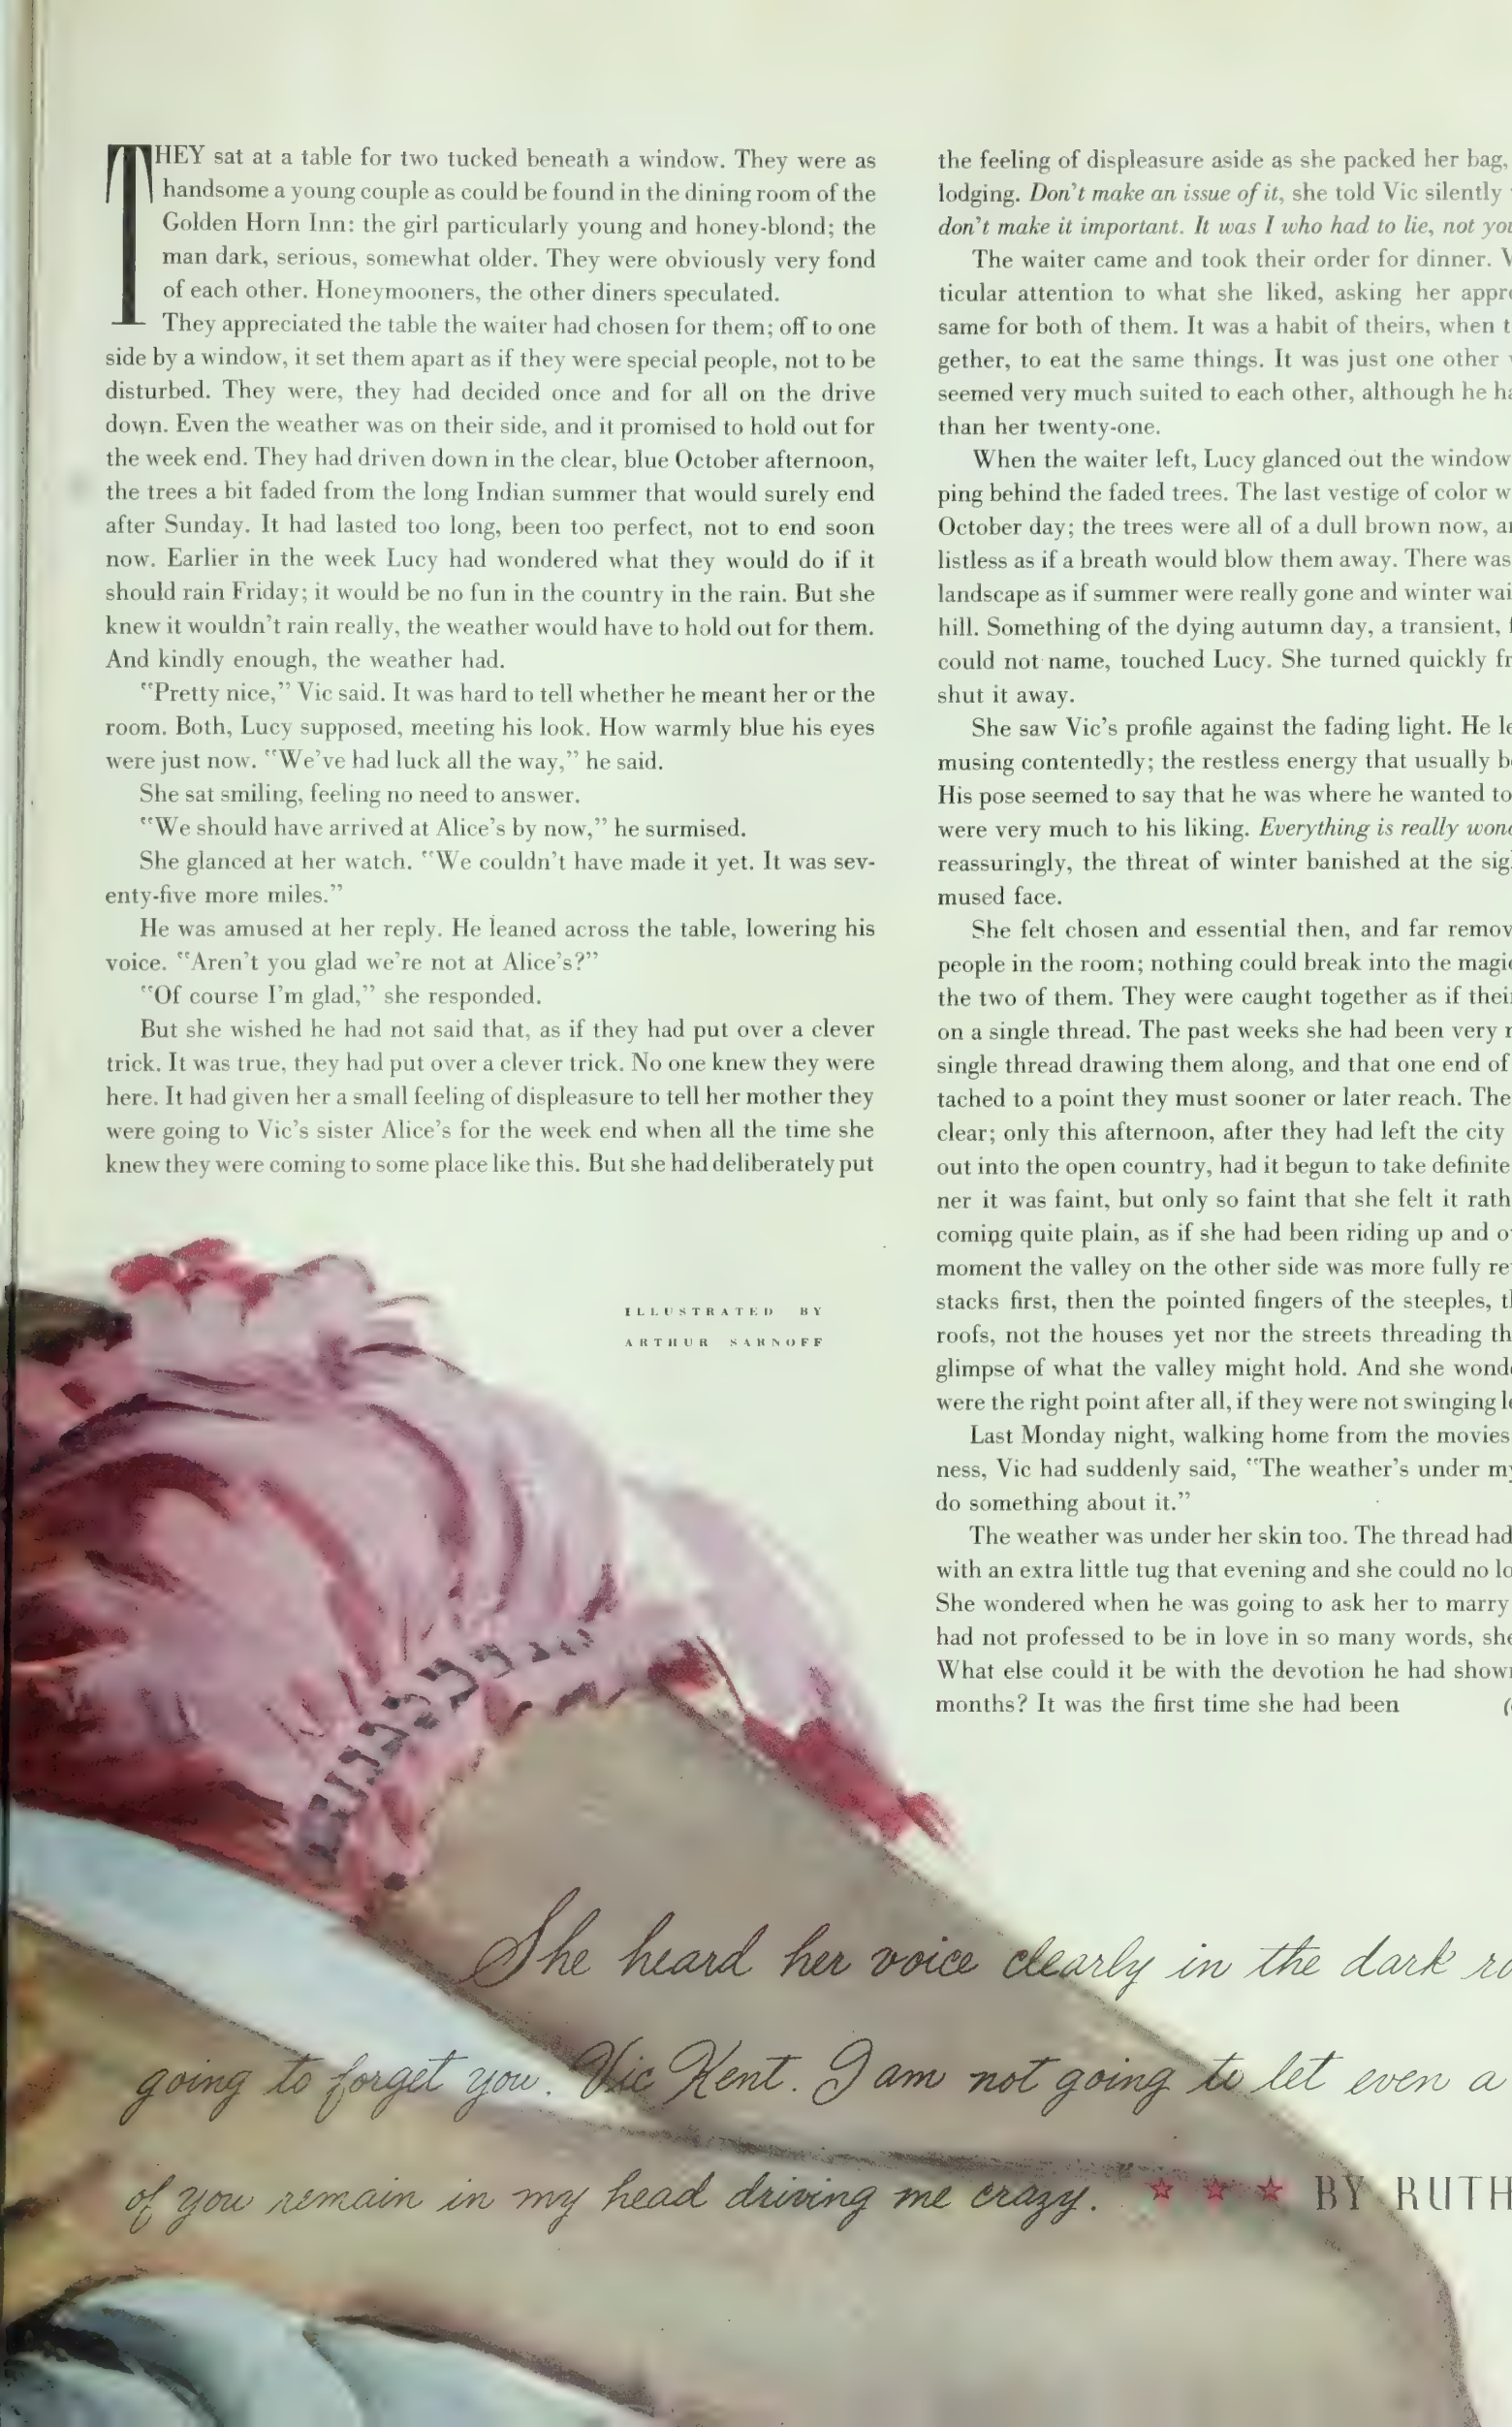
He was amused at her reply. He leaned across the table, lowering his voice. "Aren't you glad we're not at Alice's?"

"Of course I'm glad," she responded.

But she wished he had not said that, as if they had put over a clever trick. It was true, they had put over a clever trick. No one knew they were here. It had given her a small feeling of displeasure to tell her mother they were going to Vic's sister Alice's for the week end when all the time she knew they were coming to some place like this. But she had deliberately put the feeling of displeasure aside as she packed her bag, refusing to give it lodging. Don't make an issue of it, she told Vic silently with her thoughts, don't make it important. It was I who had to lie, not you.

The waiter came and took their order for dinner. Vic chose with particular attention to what she liked, asking her approval, ordering the same for both of them. It was a habit of theirs, when they had dinner together, to eat the same things. It was just one other way in which they seemed very much suited to each other, although he had nine more years than her twenty-one.

When the waiter left, Lucy glanced out the window. The sun was slipping behind the faded trees. The last vestige of color was ebbing from the October day; the trees were all of a dull brown now, and the leaves hung listless as if a breath would blow them away. There was a sadness over the landscape as if summer were really gone and winter waited just behind the hill. Something of the dying autumn day, a transient, fleeting quality she could not name, touched Lucy. She turned quickly from the window to shut it away.



She saw Vic's profile against the fading light. He leaned on his hand, musing contentedly; the restless energy that usually beset him was gone. His pose seemed to say that he was where he wanted to be and that things were very much to his liking. Everything is really wonderful, she thought reassuringly, the threat of winter banished at the sight of his calm, bemused face.

She felt chosen and essential then, and far removed from the other people in the room; nothing could break into the magic circle flung about the two of them. They were caught together as if their lives were strung on a single thread. The past weeks she had been very much aware of this single thread drawing them along, and that one end of it seemed to be attached to a point they must sooner or later reach. The point was still not clear; only this afternoon, after they had left the city behind and driven out into the open country, had it begun to take definite shape; now at dinner it was faint, but only so faint that she felt it rather than saw it becoming quite plain, as if she had been riding up and over a hill and each moment the valley on the other side was more fully revealed: the smokestacks first, then the pointed fingers of the steeples, the rows of shining roofs, not the houses yet nor the streets threading the town, but a first glimpse of what the valley might hold. And she wondered suddenly if it were the right point after all, if they were not swinging left instead of right.

Last Monday night, walking home from the movies in the warm darkness, Vic had suddenly said, "The weather's under my skin, Lucy. Let's do something about it."

The weather was under her skin too. The thread had pulled them along with an extra little tug that evening and she could no longer deny its lead. She wondered when he was going to ask her to marry him. Although he had not professed to be in love in so many words, she was sure he was. What else could it be with the devotion he had shown in the past eight months? It was the first time she had been (Continued on Page 105)

What Men notice about Women

Do they notice important things, or are things important because they notice?

BY JUDITH CHASE CHURCHILL

FIRST impressions are a whole lot more important than most of us realize, particularly as to what the male sex first notices about a woman. For it seems that men not only take note of surprising details, but have devised some very special ways of their own for uncovering clues to feminine character.

Until we popped the question to these 20 celebrities, we were under the delusion that the ways in which men were first impressed by women were pretty well standardized. But we had another guess coming. Men are far more alert than we ever suspected.

Here's what they answered. And don't say we didn't warn you that the male keeps a sharp eye open when it comes to the initial encounter.

"There are two reasons I look at a woman's feet. First, a woman probably thinks less of her feet than anything else—because she figures few people look at them. Hence, that's where real character comes out: good or bad taste in shoes; firmness or vacillation from the way she stands; a planner or a guesser from the way she takes care of her shoes." —Tex McCrary

"I have sometimes wondered whether or not I am peculiar among men in judging women by what they do not have. If they have the courage to wear the nails they were born with, be cautious with the lipstick and the cocktails—these negative signs indicate someone who may be worth knowing better. In earlier days I applied this standard of judgment to coeds—and experience proved the tests to be good ones. When I heard a pretty and attractive coed say, 'Yes, I'm Victorian and like it,' I realized she was a 'distinguished' person—in the simplest and dictionary sense of that term. She stood out; even if the Victorian standards were a bit stuffy."

—Norman Angell

"I notice her walk. I hate to see a little mincing walk on teetery heels just as much as I hate to see a girl striding along like a distance walker. You can tell a lot about a woman from a half block away just from her walk, before you ever see her face." —Robert Taylor

"The thing I am first careful to notice about any strange woman is whether my wife is looking at her or at me. If she is looking at the strange woman, it means that she finds the strange woman interesting, for one reason or another, but not ravishingly attractive. If she is looking at me, it means that the strange woman is the type she expects me to gawp at."

—David Dodge

"The first thing I notice is the color scheme of a girl's costume. I think this is true of most men. Ask a man what a girl wore, and he'll usually remember the color. Ask him to describe the dress, and he'll be stumped."

—William Kapell

"At the very beginning, I should say, I am curious to observe whether she knows how to be a woman: what she regards as her best qualities and how she goes about to bring them out. She will know what it is about herself she has confidence in, and she will convey her assurance at once even to the casual observer. What a man first notices about a woman who is a success at it is that she is a woman."

—Louis M. Hacker

"The first thing I observe about a woman are her eyes: If they twinkle she has a sense of humor and can take a rib—and I dearly love to rib a dame." —Bing Crosby

"I find so often that a woman will think that beauty shops and stylists can give her all she needs—and she ends up as a rather attractively packaged commodity, but not much more. It takes more than that to be noticed as a woman. It takes a certain inside thing, an awareness of her own basic function in society. A woman who has this walks with a real poise: she has her center, and everything about her radiates around this balance . . . the way she speaks, looks, dresses, moves; so that one is not aware of anything specific, like a handsome hat or a well-cut dress or a warm voice, but of everything at once and especially of the fact that she is a woman and knows it fully."

—Edward Fenton

"Believe it or not, I think a man looks first at a woman's clothes, although he will not thereafter have the faintest idea of what she is wearing." —George Abbott

"The first thing I notice about a woman is whether she is attractive (Continued on Page 143)

The Farm, Painted by Charles François Daubigny 1817–78

There is something exceptionally attractive about Daubigny, both as a man and as an artist. A painter with a style that concealed all innovations in apparent conventionality, he easily achieved popularity with the public and was elected to the jury of the Salon. There he waged a loyal and lonely fight to admit to the annual exhibitions the work of the younger and more radical painters. During the Franco-Prussian War he fled to England, where he persuaded his dealer, Durand-Ruel, who had opened a gallery in London, to try to sell the landscapes of an unknown and poverty-stricken artist, Claude Monet, offering to exchange his own marketable canvases for any work by Monet that remained unsold.

Sketching the river life and countryside of Central France, as he drifted down the Oise in the curious floating studio he had built himself, Daubigny appeared to the Impressionists an accepted master come to justify their methods of painting, their out-of-doors studies made directly from Nature. And yet The Farm, dated 1855, with its sensitive feeling for sequence and interval, with its skillfully balanced masses and its elimination of all unessential detail, with its simplification of the pictorial problem to a few significant elements—three houses silhouetted against the sky and a wall and a cart—goes beyond Impressionism to become a forerunner of the art of our time. But the solidity of structure and pure, almost stark design so conspicuous in The Farm appear in only one or two early landscapes by Daubigny. Most of his work shows a more poetic and intimate, though less organized, interpretation of Nature. Thus, he remained essentially the prophet of Impressionism and left to a later genius, Cézanne, the role of precursor of modern painting.

The Portrait

To make money, a man must have something someone wants—a clever wife is also a help. ★ BY BURNHAM CARTER

WHILE William Lacey was in the Army of Occupation in Germany after the war, he had his portrait painted by a German painter who did quite a business with the G. I.'s. It helped to pass the time, and it cost only half a carton of cigarettes; and when Lacey returned to the States, the portrait greatly pleased his young wife, Betty. People said it was a good likeness; it made him look trim and soldierly; and no one expected it to be great art. There was also an undeniable satisfaction in having one's portrait hanging on the wall; it bestowed a kind of immortality, as if one were already a famous ancestor.

The portrait had an additional distinction in that it was painted on wood, and William Lacey clearly remembered the German's conversation on that point. His name was Bonner, and Lacey had not liked him; he had one of those closed faces, so common among the Germans after the defeat. He showed no interest in the American soldiers, who enabled him to live rather well; and at first he said he was too busy to do Lacey's portrait.

"Where do you live in the United States?" he inquired.

"Albany," Lacey replied.

"Will you take a letter for me to an art dealer there who owes me a little money?" Lacey said he would, and after a few minutes' conversation, the German said: "I am going to paint you on wood. It will look better. You are the Italian primitive type."

Lacey understood just enough about art to know what an Italian primitive was—although he did not know why he was the "type"; but he did not mention the phrase to his friends in the Army, realizing what they would do with it.

After his return, Lacey was too busy getting ready for college to call on the art dealer for several weeks. He had been drafted at the end of his junior year, and now, since the Government was paying the college bills, he and Betty, a pretty girl with dark hair and lustrous brown eyes, thought they could get along with the help of their savings account. The college was about a hundred miles from Albany and they were given a unit in the emergency-housing project there—kitchen, bedroom and living room—at the end of a long row of units, exactly the same, but comfortable, in a setting of raw earth which "would be greatly improved by the spring planting." Their first interior decoration was the panel; it had the main wall of the living room to itself, just over the reading-and-breakfast table.

Then, on a week-end visit to his family in Albany, Lacey called on the art dealer. His name was Sigmund, and he had a typical junk shop of art in one of the city's gloomy side streets—Chinese porcelain lamps, glass and china vases, swords, candlesticks, bric-a-brac and paintings. Mr. Sigmund was small, sharp-faced and suspicious; but he became definitely more friendly when he read the note from Bonner.

"Bonner says he did a painting of you which is pretty good," Mr. Sigmund said.

"Yes. He was doing quite a business there."

"Do you like the painting?"

"Yes. My wife and I both like it."

"Because if you don't, I might be able to sell it for you. There is a small market for Bonner's paintings. Before the war I sold several for him."

"What does he get for his paintings here?"

Mr. Sigmund pushed out his under lip. "Oh, maybe a hundred dollars. It all depends. Of course, I haven't seen it, but since it's a panel, I'd say a hundred."

Lacey was pleased. He had no intention of selling the portrait, but it was comforting to know that it had a market value.

"I'm sorry you didn't bring it," Mr. Sigmund added.

"I don't have it in town," Lacey explained. "I took it to college with me. I don't want to sell it."

"I'd like to see what kind of work he's doing now."

"Well, if you come by that way, stop in."

"I might do that," Mr. Sigmund said.

Lacey gave him the address. He thought Mr. Sigmund's interest was merely polite, and he never expected to see him again. To his surprise, however, the little man showed up one afternoon in the following week. Lacey had just returned to the housing unit, feeling obstreperous after long confinement in the physics laboratory, and he had pinned Betty to the floor with a half nelson, although she was by no means subdued. Mr. Sigmund's sharp knock caused some panicky unscrambling, resulting in a rather breathless reception.

"I was driving to Syracuse," he explained, "so I thought I'd call." His pale eyes flickered briefly over Betty's flushed face, and then turned to the portrait. "So that's it," he said.

"Yes."

Mr. Sigmund stared at it for a minute or two, making little sucking noises with his tongue. "It's not bad," he declared finally. "That's the first panel of his I've seen." He went up to it and ran his finger along the edges of the wood. "I prefer a wood surface myself."

"We like it very much," Betty said.

"Well, that's good. A portrait's a nice thing to have. I was going to ask you whether you did like it because I have a customer who wants something by this man, Bonner. As a matter of fact, this customer came in the day after you were in my shop, Mr. Lacey—a coincidence, I'd say."

"Yes, it is," said Lacey. He didn't know what gave him the impression—perhaps the man's manner was a little too casual and glib—but he thought that Mr. Sigmund was lying. (Continued on Page 260)

Around Charlottesville

Where one of our greatest Presidents showed himself to be as well a man of outstanding artistic taste and an architect of extraordinary talent. ★ BY RICHARD PRATT

Architectural Editor of the Journal

NO architect ever built himself a better home or put more of his own personality into his house than Jefferson did at Monticello. As far as that goes, I can think of no citizen who ever bestowed upon his town a more beautiful range of buildings than those which Jefferson designed for the University of Virginia at Charlottesville near by. Nor to my knowledge has any neighbor done more for the mansions of his countryside friends than Jefferson did at Bremo for John Cocke, at Farmington for George Divers, at Estouteville for John Coles III, or at Redlands for Robert Carter, to mention merely the four great houses that are shown a few pages farther on—four out of many more great Virginia houses which in one way or another have Jefferson to thank for their greatness.

But all this was just around Charlottesville. Monticello, the university, a dozen great houses. It was almost the whole young republic, however, which came under the influence of this man's passionate devotion to architecture. He was determined that his country's countenance should glow with classic grandeur; and glow it did. Yet nowhere more wonderfully than around Charlottesville, and nowhere more to his own delight, I am sure, than at Monticello.

Houdon's bust of Franklin and Cerrachi's of Napoleon look down upon what Jefferson called the Tea Room, in the western wing, next to the dining room.

This bedroom was called "Madison's room," after one of its most frequent occupants. The alcove bed was one of Thomas Jefferson's space-saving ideas.

Through one of the doorways of the entrance hall you see Jefferson's dressing room and, beyond his ingeniously situated bed, his private study.

For all its pure Palladian splendor, Monticello attracts you as much for its livable, homelike scale as for its classic patrician beauty.

Painted by Rembrandt Peale in the winter of 1805, when Jefferson was 62 and President.

Architecture is my delight..

and putting up and pulling down, one of my favorite amusements." Jefferson must have had Monticello in mind when he said this about himself, for as a matter of fact, not very long after he had completed his home, with its original two-story portico, he did pull a great deal of it down, and then put it up in its present form, more pleasing this way to him in both plan and appearance. And one of his delights within the house was to design the various devices and furnishings shown here, most revealing of his many-sided genius.

The Declaration of Independence's author, from all accounts, played the violin commendably. For quartets with his musical friends, it was only natural that he should design a special music stand, about which they could play, each with his music before him, and with a cabinet below for a collection of scores.

Jefferson liked to do much of his writing and drawing standing up—he contended that he could think better while pacing the floor—and the tall table he designed, which stands in his Monticello study, was planned with characteristic ingenuity and originality—expandable, adjustable and flexible to a degree.

PHOTOS BY EZRA STOLLER

Against the lofty white ceiling of the entrance portico, Jefferson set the bronze compass plate he designed to indicate for his convenience the direction of the wind. The indicator on the compass is connected by a slender rod to a handsome weather vane standing up from the roof directly over the portico.

Jefferson could give great style to any object to which he put his creative hand, but that he could make it extremely useful, too, is shown by his octagonal table, with its cleverly designed drawers, which make it in a sense the precursor of the modern filing cabinet—on casters for mobility. It was a space saver too.

Visitors to Monticello are greeted in the entrance hall by one of Jefferson's most elaborate and fascinating contraptions: a clock operating by a two-way system of cannon-ball weights; the left-hand balls (by Jefferson's ladder) taking care of the hourly strokes, the right-hand ones indicating the days of the week.

Seldom idle because of his many interests and activities, Jefferson designed this two-part chaise longue with table for working while reclining. The chair has a revolving seat, the table a revolving top, making for maximum maneuverability combined with comfort, and probably originating the swivel-chair idea.

The Wedgwood mantelpiece in the Monticello dining room embodies Jefferson's beauty-use principles in a manner which captivates the visitor today almost as much as it must have entertained the great man's guests a century and a half ago. Wine bottles rise from the cellar on one side, descend empty on the other.

The beautiful shaded side of Bremo is approached by a footbridge over a dry moat, designed to keep cattle from the lawn without a fence to break the view.

PHOTOS BY JAMES R. JOHNSON

The portico of Estouteville has the classic grandeur that Jefferson admired.

Bremo

It probably would have been difficult around Charlottesville during Jefferson's active life to build an important house without getting advice or plans from the sage of Monticello; and in the case of Bremo, in many ways the finest example of the Jeffersonian school, there are records to show that while the master may not have done the actual designing, he was certainly often consulted, for the owner, General John H. Cocke, exchanged frequent letters with Jefferson during construction.

Estouteville

As you can see from all four houses here, Jefferson's fondness for the Doric order, which he used at Monticello, influenced every house that came under his spell. And wherever his lead was faithfully followed, as in the case of Estouteville, the spacing, proportions and detailing were made with great accuracy and style. Like Monticello, Estouteville is a hilltop house, here on a gentle summit of Green Mountain. These splendid houses influenced builders all over the U. S. A.

Farmington

Of this fine house it can be said for certain that it was actually designed by Jefferson, for his friend George Divers. It has the octagonal wing, the circular windows characteristic of Monticello, and the rooftop balustrade is of the Chinese fretwork of which Jefferson was so fond. It now makes just about as handsome a country club as you're ever likely to find in any region.

Redlands

More Georgian and less classic in feeling than the other houses, Redlands is more in the Federal spirit of Jefferson's taste than in the Colonial, about which Jefferson was quite disdainful, having a distinct dislike for many of the great mansions down the James, in Williamsburg and elsewhere, as far too fancy, in his opinion – houses which today receive almost universal admiration.

No match for Monticello, Farmington is more like that famous mansion than any other of the Jeffersonian houses.

Striking beauties of Redlands are the brickwork, the elegant rhythm of the window placement, and the exquisite porch, designed recently with great sensitivity.

She stopped, suddenly frightened by the look on Mike's face. He was listening to her at last.

A Way With Boys

BY DAN SENSENEY

MISS RUMSEY and Mrs. Cracker were having an altercation. It did not sound like one, being conducted in the tones of sweet reasonableness proper between day floor supervisor and cleaning woman, but neither was in the slightest doubt as to its real nature.

"It is not necessary, Mrs. Cracker, to clean Three-C oftener than once every morning," Miss Rumsey said, the white armor of her uniform creaking slightly. "You never do the other rooms oftener than that."

"Sometimes I do," Mrs. Cracker countered quickly. "Sometimes I do indeed, Miss Rumsey. For seventeen years I've worked for this hospital and for twelve years before that for the Polyclinic, and never until this day did I hear a word of complaint. I do my best, Miss Rumsey. I keep them rooms like they was my own house, so to speak, and you know yourself how the dirt gathers. If I have a minute to spare, I go back into a room I maybe wasn't able to do just right the first time, on account of the doctor or somebody coming in, or the patient, poor creature, catching a bit of rest, and I just give that room another going over, like. I'm sorry if I'm not giving satisfaction, Miss Rumsey, dear knows I try, but I've only got the one pair of hands, and ——"

Miss Rumsey raised her voice to stem the flow of words. "Please, Mrs. Cracker. No one is criticizing your work. It is excellent, and we're all very happy to have you on this floor. My point is that you mustn't disturb the patient in Three-C more than necessary. He's a very sick little boy, and Doctor Kinnear has given strict orders to keep him perfectly quiet. But you were in there three times yesterday that I know of, and ——"

"Ah, he's a fine doctor, that Doctor Kinnear!" said Mrs. Cracker with enthusiasm. "Any patient of his is lucky to have him, and that's what I always say." She took a new grip on the handle of her mop, leaning on it comfortably, settling herself for a nice long talk. "And what does he say about little Mike, Miss Rumsey? Is he getting better now?"

"Doctor Kinnear doesn't discuss his patients with me," the supervisor said with a coldness which was intended to disguise her sense of defeat.

Miss Rumsey ruled everyone else on the third floor—patients, orderlies, interns—with a firm hand, but that hand lost its authority whenever it attempted to deal with Mrs. Cracker, who was old, unhurrying and, Miss Rumsey was convinced, abysmally stupid. You couldn't be firm with someone who simply didn't recognize firmness when she met it. Yet Miss Rumsey intended to keep on trying.

"Please do not go into Three-C unless it is absolutely necessary," she commanded, and went quickly down the corridor.

Mrs. Cracker picked up her pail and mop and proceeded in the opposite direction. On her lips, now that Miss Rumsey couldn't see it there, was a faint smile, exasperated but tolerant. These nurses, Mrs. Cracker was thinking, these nurses with their "absolute quiet" and their "doctor's orders"! Poor creatures, they didn't know any better, but it was Mrs. Cracker's experience that when you were lying sick and helpless in bed there was nothing like a bit of company to cheer you up. Especially if you were a boy seven years old with a body that had been cruelly burned in an automobile accident.

There was nothing you could tell Mrs. Cracker about boys. She had raised five of her own, pretty much all by herself, and had done a good job of it too. Yes, and nursed them through assorted illnesses, as skillfully as Miss Rumsey could have done with all her starch.

It was eleven-fifteen in the morning, and Miss Rumsey always went down for her lunch at half past. Mrs. Cracker did Three-J, taking her time about it, pausing to glance over Three-J's shoulder at the tabloid he was reading and deliver some pithy comments concerning a blond housewife who had been found dead under mysterious circumstances and her own suburban front porch. Three-J thought Mrs. Cracker was a character; most patients did. She knew this and didn't mind.

Three-J also depended upon Mrs. Cracker to keep him up-to-date on current hospital gossip, which she collected from nurses, orderlies and other patients like a spry old squirrel collecting nuts.

"How's the boy down the hall doing?" he asked her.

Mrs. Cracker gave her mop a pensive swish and pursed her lips. "About the same," she said. "Lies there with his eyes wide open looking at the ceiling. Good as gold—too good. Makes your heart break to see him."

"Have they told him yet about his father and mother?"

"Not a word," Mrs. Cracker said, "but if you ask me, he's guessed it, and that's why he acts like he does. He ain't coming along the way he should, he ain't acting right, and there's got to be some reason. They took the bandages off yesterday—burns just about healed up. But he's still sick."

"Poor little kid."

"You may well say that," Mrs. Cracker agreed. "What's to become of him, the darling? With his dad (Continued on Page 272)

KINFOLK

What wrong had their daughter done in her eagerness to make herself beloved?

BY PEARL S. BUCK

FOR twenty years, the family of Dr. Liang Wen Hua, distinguished Chinese scholar and writer, had been living the life of aliens—in a Riverside Drive apartment overlooking the George Washington Bridge in New York City.

On the surface, it was a serene life, yet underneath were forces that would soon divide the family. Doctor Liang was happy enough in New York, and so were his two youngest children, Louise, secretly in love with an American, and Peter, studying to be an engineer. But his wife and his elder son and daughter, James and Mary, wanted to return to the land of their ancestors.

It was James who made the first break. He had to choose between love and his conscience—between Lili Li, fragile and beautiful daughter of a wealthy expatriated merchant, and his belief that it was his duty to use his skill as an American-trained doctor in China. When Lili refused to go to Peking with him, James went alone—only half realizing the chain of events that would follow on his departure.

II

ALONE on the bench, Mary read again the letter from beginning to end, trying to imagine scene by scene what it contained. But she had nothing to feed her imagination, and at last she rose and walked home again. The house was quiet and in the living room her father still slept, his face handsome and full of peace. She tiptoed into his study and took the receiver from the telephone and dialed.

"Oh, please, is Lili there?" she asked, when she heard Mollie's voice.

"I'll call her, miss."

She heard Mollie's heavy footsteps, Lili's high heels tripping over bare floors, and then Lili's sweet voice that sounded falsetto over the wires.

"Yes, ye-es?"

"Lili, this is Mary. I've had a letter from Jim. Shall I bring it over?"

There was a pause, and Lili laughed. "Oh, lovelee! But Mary, just now I am so busy. Shall I call you?"

Mary's ready temper flew from her heart. "Don't trouble—you don't want to hear it, Lili!" she exclaimed. "Why don't you say so?"

"But I do, very much!" Lili Li told her.

"You do not."

"Ye-es, Mary, please come over now—with the letter." The pretty voice was pleading. Mary longed to refuse, but she dared not.

"All right. I'm on my way now."

She put up the telephone and went at once, letting herself out of the house silently. She did not want anyone to know where she was, for she did not want anyone to know what happened—whatever it was to be.

Lili was lying on a couch in her bedroom, and there Mollie led Mary. "She says to tell you she's got only a little while, being as she's promised to go to a tea."

"I shan't need but a little while," Mary said.

There was no hint of haste in Lili's calm manner. She put out her soft hand to Mary. "You know I am glad you told me about Jim's letter. I feel so bad here—about Jim." She laid her hand on her left breast. "Every day I wish to write a letter."

"It would make him very happy." Mary sat down in a pink satin chair and felt hot and plain.

"But what can I tell him?" Lili asked. "Everything is not sure. Maybe many years before he is ready for me."

"He is ready for you now," Mary said. She unfolded the letter and began to read it slowly and clearly.

Lili listened, her great eyes earnest and a tender smile about her mouth. When Mary had finished she felt under the satin pillow and found a lace handkerchief with which she slowly wiped her eyes. "I long to go to Peking."

"Then why don't you?" Mary asked.

"I cannot just go." Her beautiful lips trembled. "I have to think about many things."

"If you love James you would think only of him."

Lili shook her head. "I am Chinese," she told Mary. "And I cannot just think about one man."

The UNPOSSESSED

The hardest choice a man must make is between the woman he loves and the other he desires. • By Nancy Barnes

MICHAEL THORNE finished the last Chopin nocturne, playing with that almost contemptuous mastery that had been the envy of Roget's other pupils, and rose to make the quick Continental bow that was so exotic in Midland. The faculty wives of Methodist College and their husbands spattered applause, followed only slightly later by the rest of the audience, and his annual concert in the town was over.

Michael's dark eyes found and settled for a breath upon the bright face uplifted to him from the second row, and his interest leaped. She's like a little candle, he thought, amused, as he gave her a special smile.

He made his way through the audience, stopping now and then to greet his father's old friends, his progress surely, if unobtrusively, in her direction. The hunting instinct, never long dormant in him, stirred as he paused beside her, turning inquiring eyes upon Mrs. Hubbard, who pursued him, panting.

"This is Sophie Campbell," Mrs. Hubbard said, her inflection as nicely calculated as if she said, "This is only Sophie Campbell," and Michael instantly realized the girl's total unimportance in the Midland social scheme, but he smiled warmly. After all, a man couldn't be perpetually thinking of his future. He revised his candle simile as the girl held out a thin hand. Her narrow face with its high cheekbones had the translucence of fine china, her teeth sparkled, her hair shone.

She isn't a candle, he thought, not listening while she said, "Simply marvelous," and other inanities. You can't trim and shine a candle. She's like a little lamp, all polished and glowing.

As she walked ahead of him up the aisle, he saw that she was no taller than a child. But how alive she is! he thought. The heaviness with which the Midland matrons always afflicted him began to lift and float away.

"You made my spine shiver," Sophie Campbell said.

"I'm sorry." He wondered if his crooked smile would engage her as it had older and wiser ladies.

"Oh, it was nice," she assured him. "I get that way when people are good. I nearly froze once watching Tilden play tennis in a newsreel. It means you're a genius. My spine isn't ever wrong."

He could, she admitted, walk home with her, and she waited while he said good night to the ladies most responsible for his concert.

"Because I can walk, now that I found my shoe," Sophie remarked, as they started off in the clear moonlight.

Leaves made a shifting pattern on the old brick walk, there was an elusive scent of new-cut grass and . . . was it petunias? He tried to identify the nostalgic fragrance while Sophie chattered on, every second word italicized.

". . . and I'm not used to shoes, only Maudie lent me these because she's sick of me wearing barefoot sandals. Homer's mad—Homer's her brother—because he says nobody just kicks her shoe over her head simply because it's spring. And we found the shoe in the back of his car after we'd looked everywhere in the road, me hopping on one foot. They hurt anyway, those shoes. And now he'll be madder because I came home with you. But I don't care because I'm happy, happy, happy."

Michael laughed and, as she said, "Here's where I live," he stooped and kissed her lightly, out of a perverse desire to hear her shocked protest. But she said, "Oh!" and that was all. They stopped at the porch of the shabby house.

"Why barefoot sandals?" Michael asked idly. It was, he realized, the first words he had uttered since they left the hall.

"Oh, because my uncle had a whole case of them when his store went broke. There's not much fit to barefoot sandals. I couldn't afford shoes and stockings, so I pretended I was a girl who liked her comfort. But I'm saving up for shoes now that my library course is paid for. Soon I can maybe buy a hat too."

After that Sophie was his girl and he stopped for her most afternoons at the library. She was enchanted with the long roadster Ted Dawson had lent him for the summer, and informed him that all the girls in town were jealous of her.

"That's why they don't invite us to their parties. Because they're jealous," she said. "But I don't care. I did the awfulest thing today." She giggled and gave a bounce on the seat beside him. "I told Mrs. Skinner last week that the red book in the corner of the third fiction shelf was a sweet little story that she'd love, and today I gave her the red book that was there now and she came back in an hour, simply livid. The girl in this red book had a baby and went crazy in the first chapter and Mrs. Skinner said that was what came of my running round with a boy who'd been studying music in Paris. So maybe I'll be fired. Aren't my new shoes slick? Only when you wear shoes like this you ought to have stockings, and the upkeep ——"

Michael said, "Quiet! Quiet!" stifling unease. Perhaps he ought not to be wasting time with anyone so irrelevant as Sophie. Mrs. Skinner's trouble was that she had two plain daughters. (Continued on Page 125)

The TIMELESS DRES in black crepe

The lovely necessity of every wardrobe, the keenest spur for your inventiveness. This year it will have softly rounded shoulders, a skirt that is slim but easy, a neckline that pins high or opens in a V—and very probably a row of small rhinestone or gold buttons.

Its accessories: the small hat in velvet, fur, ribbon or felt; the scarf in colorful silk or a broadtail stole; the gloves, long, soft, hand-sewn doeskins; the jewelry, gold, pearls or rhinestones.

THE DOMINEERING DOLLAR and six ways to stretch it

There is no dollar-answer to the question, "How much does it cost to be well dressed?" It is constantly astonishing to see how well some women do it on very little, how far afield others can go with a great deal more to spend. We are convinced that the ones who do it best do not depend on money alone.

Stretching the dollar is something women have done superbly since time began, out of necessity and with native inventiveness. And when dollars shrink in the hand, as they seem to do today, there is a special premium on your own habits and capacities.

Taste. Nebulous, you say, and hard to acquire if you're not born with it. We say that it can be cultivated. Too much of anything is bad taste, whether it is covering yourself with jewelry or monopolizing the conversation. Taste is personal discernment. It is the same beige dress, worn with a black scarf, a green one, or with russet leather accessories. It is the knowledge that simplicity is always in fashion.

Self-Appraisal. We believe in the law of compensation. If your figure isn't a dream, you may have beautiful feet and ankles, unusual eyes or hair. Clothes that play up your fine points and play down your flaws are priceless. When you try them on, try to see yourself as the world sees you—profile and back view, as well as face-on. Remember your compliments—how easy—especially from your husband and your best friends. When they say, "I wish you'd always wear blue," or "I love you in that dress," they're usually right.

Appraisal of Fashion. There are certain women who follow fashion on a leash, looking continually for something new—but it's a costly and a trivial pursuit. The "latest thing" is not always the best thing. The less extreme (and less expensive) follows invariably, and lives longer. When there is as much profusion in fashion as there is today, it needs more than usual sifting. Which new coat goes with the clothes you have? Which dress do you need—the wool jersey or the slipper satin?

Ingenuity may mean converting a sewing basket into a handbag, turning a hat back to front because it looks better that way, making a fur collar out of the one good spot in an old fur coat. One woman we know pins old jewelry on a piece of ribbon and wears it as a bracelet. Another slips two shades of ribbon through a circlet pin or buckle for her lapel. Another ties a scarf a different way every time she wears it. The best "props" for your imagination are scarfs, antique or unusual jewelry, pearls of all lengths, belts, ribbons, flowers. Your prized garnet or topaz pin, gold bracelets, fine leather accessories are things of beauty that never go out of fashion. Collect them year to year.

Brush and Polish. Taking care of your clothes—continually, not in spurts—repays you with every wearing. A dress or skirt hung badly on a hanger will hang badly on you. A hat tossed on a shelf will never look as well as the one kept in a hatbox. Well pressed is half of well dressed. The polished shoe, the straight seam, the brushed shoulder, the immaculate glove has more to do with your appearance than the newness or costliness of anything you wear.

Spending Time. We know that time is hard to find, that you shop on a lunch hour, that you can't leave the children. We also know that almost always you'll spend less money and get more for it if you spend more time. Only by sheerest luck will you find just what you want in the first ten minutes, or the first hour . . . or in the last ten minutes before the party. Clothes are not a matter of luck. Cinderella had luck, more than she deserved. Being realistic in the surer way.—R. M. P.

PARIS...THIS YEAR

Disarmingly and with enormous appeal to American women, Paris has created fashions that are America-inspired. Tweeds, flannels and jerseys that are right for our city and country life, suits with young boxy jackets and lean narrow skirts, casual button-down-the-front dresses, warm voluminous coats . . . clothes that are wearable and that forecast a future of simpler unextreme fashions. Many skirts are several inches shorter, waistlines sometimes higher. The best silhouettes are slim or flat-pleated or with belted-in fullness. Would your love taste sweeter

"BROILED lamb chops," Frances told the waiter, "and a plain salad, no dressing." She glanced up at Margaret, raising her eyebrows in a question. "You, my pet?"

She had ordered automatically, without even picking up the menu; Margaret, her head still down, still studying the menu, wished that she could make up her mind more quickly. But she could not; she simply could not. There were so many good things on the menu, things she seldom had, and she was determined to find the one she really wanted.

with bitter envy, of the security, the blessed security, of Margaret's world.

"I was thinking about the lobster Newburg," she said at last.

Frances laughed. "You, you skinny witch, can both think about it and have it. All I can do is think about it. Honestly, Margie, you just don't get fat, do you?"

"I just don't," Margaret admitted. She did not add the thought that ran through her mind; she did not say, If you lived up three flights of stairs and had three small children and did your own work, you wouldn't get fat either. She did not say it, and she was sorry she had even thought it; she did not want anything to spoil the pleasure of this afternoon. But sometimes when she was with Frances she found herself thinking things like that far too often. She looked across the table now and said, with frank admiration, "But you don't get fat either, Fran. You look wonderful, you really do."

"No," Frances said, a little grimly. "I don't get fat. I just starve to death quietly, that's all. I just spend three hours a day in that gym, with a bully of a woman standing over me with a whip—she keeps it hidden, of course; she wears it stuck up the back of that ridiculous little suit she wears, and that's how she manages to stand so straight." They were both laughing now. "Of course, I've never actually seen the whip," Frances went on. "But you can't fool me. The tone of voice she uses, you just know she's got a whip. . . . I'm so doggone tired."

"You don't even look tired," Margaret said loyally.

Frances smiled at her. "You are a most satisfactory cousin," she said.

They were first cousins, and that in itself was a bond, but there was much more than that between them. They were both orphans, too; when they were young girls Frances had been a full orphan and Margaret had been a half orphan, living quietly with her father in the little university town where he taught. Frances had spent most of her youth in a dreary boarding school, (Continued on Page 196)

Children Without Neuroses

BY DR. ROLAND P. MACKAY

Our society has a body of ethics—qualities which in an older day we called spiritual—carved laboriously out of the ages of human experience. These qualities are fundamental, and must be passed on to our successors or our culture dies. They include honesty, courage, love of truth, loyalty, devotion to duty, unselfishness, respect for just authority and concern for the rights of others. They are the soul of a democracy. They are also examples of the character traits which are available for the rearing of our children.

Dr. Roland P. Mackay, neurologist and psychiatrist, is professor of neurology at the University of Illinois College of Medicine, senior attending neuropsychiatrist at St. Luke's Hospital in Chicago, a fellow of the American Medical Association and a director of the American Board of Psychiatry and Neurology. His training was obtained at the University of Toronto, the Mayo Clinic, and abroad. He is the father of three children: two girls, eighteen and fourteen; and a boy aged eleven.

IT has been said that ours is a uniquely neurotic period in history. And whether this is true or not, it is certainly an age of unreason, marked by bitterness, conflict and hatred.

Men and women are restless, dissatisfied with themselves and with one another. It is being borne in upon us inescapably that we must learn how to live with our neighbors on a crowded, shrinking planet, or the democratic way we prize will vanish from the earth.

How may we approach this great problem, the most urgent with which we have to deal? I believe the answer lies in our own homes. Will you look at it with me through the eyes of a neurologist?

You will grant, I believe, that the main trouble with the world today is the perversity and contrariety of human behavior. That much is readily apparent. But the significant thing, and one not generally understood, is that such behavior does not arise from intellectual differences among people, but from emotional forces in the individual.

For human beings act according to original impulses of self-preservation and race preservation—not a new thought, but as true and potent as if it were the latest discovery of science. If man is unhappy and perverse, if his natural capacity for love is turned to hate, if he is unable to sacrifice a false, immediate advantage for a great ideal, if he seeks his own destruction, it is because in childhood he has been molded to futility by his parents and by the society in which he lives.

If the behavior of society itself is neurotic, that can only mean that the training of its youth has been a failure. And if we would prevent a further drift toward neuroticism (for to "cure" it after it has appeared is both difficult and uncertain) we must study childhood, and the kind of discipline we give our young.

Do not think, however, that I am one of those who would heap all the evils of our civilization upon the head of poor "mom." We must recognize that the earnest, conscientious parent of late years has been the victim of many conflicting voices, all "authoritative"—and all disagreeing among themselves. Witness the "to spank or not to spank" controversies, the doctrines of self-expression versus frustration, the ponderous debates over sex education, even over the feeding and weaning of babies.

There are still those, indeed, who hold to the doctrine of "maturation"—the idea that children should be left alone to "just grow," like Topsy. This theory (perhaps attributable in part to John Dewey) may hold true for ants and bees, but not for animals with a higher organization, and certainly not for human beings.

If one must train a good hunting dog not to devour the birds he retrieves, how can one escape training a child to be honest, charitable and dependable? If our intellectual heritage must be carefully and diligently offered to the young in formal schooling, surely the more subtle and fundamental traits of character must be as patiently instilled. To allow a child to "just grow" is to leave the formation of his character to chance—the worst form of neglect. It is youngsters of this type whom the neurologist and psychiatrist see most often.

Now I know that no one wants to rear a neurotic. And I am going to take as my major premise that to avoid doing so, it makes a great difference whether and how we discipline or train our children.

Fortunately, we are no longer dependent upon theories for our understanding of the processes of learning and the way neuroses come into being. From the work done on animals by Pavlov and many others we have learned some of the laws by which original or instinctive impulses expand into the "acquired" behavior of the individual. What is even more important, we have learned some of the circumstances under which neuroses can be produced in an animal during this process, exhibiting in simple form many of the characteristics of the human neuroses. Though the data are limited as yet, they do represent our first objective approach to the molding of character and to its distortions, the neuroses.

Let us examine a few of the laws and principles that have been worked out with animals, and see how we may apply them to the discipline and training of children.

First of all we find that, for the establishment of conditioned reflexes in an animal—or for the training of a child—there must be a definite objective. One must, in short, have something to teach. Yet in my experience, this is a point on which modern parents fail most often. Lacking any major principles for governing their own prejudices and emotions, many deal with their offspring as the whim of the moment dictates. At times too lenient, at other times too harsh, the only philosophy they can transmit is to pursue personal pleasure and convenience.

What, then, should we teach? I should like to point out that our society has a body of ethics—qualities which in an older day we called spiritual—carved laboriously out of the ages of human experience. These qualities are fundamental, and must be passed on to our successors or our culture dies. They include honesty, courage, love of truth, loyalty, devotion to duty, unselfishness, respect for just authority and concern for the rights of others, to name just a few.

Such virtues may sound old-fashioned in these acquisitive, amoral times. Nevertheless, they are the soul of a democracy. They are also examples of the character traits, the "conditioned reflexes," which are available for the rearing of our children. They are some of the virtues underlying emotional maturity, and also underlying a gracious, tolerant civilization. To fail to impart them is to abandon our offspring to a poverty (Continued on Page 278)

If You Ask Me

BY ELEANOR ROOSEVELT

What would you say to the increasing amount of testimony piling up, including that of former Ambassador to Russia William Bullitt, that President Roosevelt knowingly let communists into the Government? Was this because they made yes-men to his policy of appeasing Russia, giving them everything they asked for?

I do not think that my husband knowingly allowed communists to enter Government service. I do not think, though I read Mr. Bullitt's articles carefully, that he says that. Mr. Bullitt has written articles giving his point of view. Other people may hold different points of view. He was not at the meetings of which he writes. The amount of credence that you give to Mr. Bullitt's statements, of course, will be conditioned by the amount you know about Mr. Bullitt's character.

The second part of your question naturally has been answered when I said that knowingly my husband never permitted anyone in Government service who was a communist; but since you seem to imply that he was bent on appeasing Russia and giving her everything that she asked for, I would remind you that the U.S.S.R., once she became an Ally, was killing more Germans than anyone else, and therefore it was in our interest to give her the weapons to accomplish this end and to keep her fighting. It saved our men and it was not appeasement.

During the war I served as a white officer commanding colored troops for a year and a half. What careers are available in the field of race relationships if I should decide to devote my life to this type of work?

I do not know that there are any careers open. If you want to work with an organization like the NAACP, and you are a lawyer, you could possibly be retained by them, or you could work in the office in some executive capacity, or be an organizer in the field. There is work in race relations to be done in the labor unions, but there is the greater work to be done in our own communities in the effort to wipe out bigotry and discrimination where they are most apt to crop up. There are, of course, opportunities in government service, on both the state and the national level, and many personnel jobs in many industries today give opportunity for doing good work in race relations, since both the unions and employers, in many instances, are working to eliminate discrimination.

I am asking you for help in settling an argument. Does the tomb of the unknown soldier contain a body?

The tomb contains an unidentified soldier's body.

I am a seventeen-year-old boy in love with a girl of seventeen, who is also in love with me. Her sister is always criticizing me for something and telling her mother. Now the girl wants me to join the Navy until it blows over. Do you think I should join the Navy?

I am afraid I am not in a position, without knowing you or the girl or your respective families, to give you advice, but at seventeen it would be foolish for you and for the girl to decide on your future. You may, of course, soon be in the draft, and if you prefer to go into the Navy it might be wise for you to try that. It would give you a change of interests and it might be a good thing, since you ought to be very sure before you marry that you are not yielding to the fact that you and the girl live near each other and that it is easy to go together.

My best friend, who is an attractive blonde, is losing all interest in life because of a certain fellow. It has been a year since they broke up. He made varsity football and doesn't seem to want to bother with her any more. How can I help her overcome her feeling for him, or advise her how to get him back again?

REPRINTED COURTESY THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

"I wouldn't care so much about this train taking me far away from Arnold if I were sure it was bringing me closer to somebody else!"

I think you had better be a little careful about interfering, even with your best friend. She would probably resent it, and in all probability time is what is needed to solve her problem.

I am a sophomore at the University of Oregon and wish to spend my junior and senior years studying in France. I understand that UNESCO has an exchange-students plan and that you work in UNESCO. Where can I get complete information about the plan for exchange students between countries?

I do not work in UNESCO. I am chairman of the Human Rights Commission. UNESCO is a different body, a specialized agency that works in co-operation with the Economic and Social Council of the U.N. They do take a great interest in exchange students and therefore I think if you write to the representative of UNESCO, Lake Success, New York, you will be sent the necessary information.

What is your opinion of the Kasenkina affair?

I am very sorry for Mme. Kasenkina. She has been through a very trying experience. Russian nationals are not allowed to leave Russia without permission.

Her husband and son were evidently suspect and disappeared. Her sorrow and her fear must have been very great, and I think she showed how desperate she was when she determined to jump from the consulate window rather than return to the U.S.S.R. Incidents of this kind point up for us the kind of terror existing in any country which is controlled by secret police.

We know nothing about this in our country, and we had better be extremely careful never to allow such a condition to come about in our country.

Have any of your sons been killed overseas in battle or lost for years, to be presumed dead and later found in an isolated grave in the jungle? If not, are you qualified to state how "members of your family" feel about being brought home to lie in the family plot where they belong?

I am surprised at the tone of your question. I have no criticism of those who wish to bring home their dead. I think it is harder on the family sometimes when it is done, but they are the ones to decide and the Government has taken that position, as I understand it.

When I said how members of my family felt I did not state what my feeling was, but my boys did fight all over the world and they faced the fact that they might die in far-distant places or on the ocean and they told us what they felt. My own feelings would not enter into such a matter. I would do what I thought the person I cared about would wish to have done.

In your candid opinion, are the women's clubs of this country accomplishing any good purpose? Do you think women's clubs are too militant or too apologetic in expressing their opinions?

Women's clubs in this country vary in their activities. Nearly all of them serve some really good purpose to which they apply their energies. I do not think they are uniformly valuable, but I think there is every opportunity to make them more valuable. The woman power of the nation can make itself felt more than it does at present if the women's clubs function more cooperatively on certain great questions which affect most women in the domestic and international fields.

did you, darling? Loved her a lot?"

Tea with a Lady

SHE was a maddening girl—really maddening. Rodney jerked back the curtain and twitched his tie into place. There she walked in the street below, bareheaded although it was raining, ambling along although she was already late, turning now, as he watched, to stare in that junk-shop window; stopping and staring, leaning against the pane.

The narrow street of narrow, tall, graystone houses had an underwater radiance, ghostly and pale. Only the gold of her hair and the red of her mackintosh swam bright in the shiny pavements spattered with rain.

Still she didn't move.

He would catch her eye, urge her on, make her hurry. He flung up the window. She saw him and smiled and waved, and an odd little bump of feeling—laughter, indulgence, what was it?—stopped him short.

But maddening she certainly was, all the same.

He went to the flat door, opened it and waited. Six chromium coat hooks decorated the wall, and his scale drawing of a crane, signed in the corner "Ballard and Ballard, Civil Engineers." Perhaps it lacked something, that hall. Lisa would change it.

After what seemed a long time he heard an odd sound—a rhythmic sort of rattle; he couldn't quite place it. And looking down, he saw Lisa mounting the stairs, her soft, straight hair hanging lank against her wet mackintosh, one hand in her pocket, the other—he might have guessed—trailing after her, finger nails flicking the baluster slats.

Not hurrying, even now!

"Hello, darling," he said. "You're late."

She looked up and smiled. "Hello, darling," she murmured. "Am I?"

Her cheek was all wet and cold, and her hair dewed over; even her eyelashes, Rodney saw, were wet. It was like drinking sweetness out of a flower to kiss her, to turn his lips in against that tender young neck.

"Hel*lo*, darling!" she said.

"Come in," he said. "Take your things off." Already her mackintosh was slithering down off her arms to the floor—doubtless to make a pool there. (Continued on Page 144)

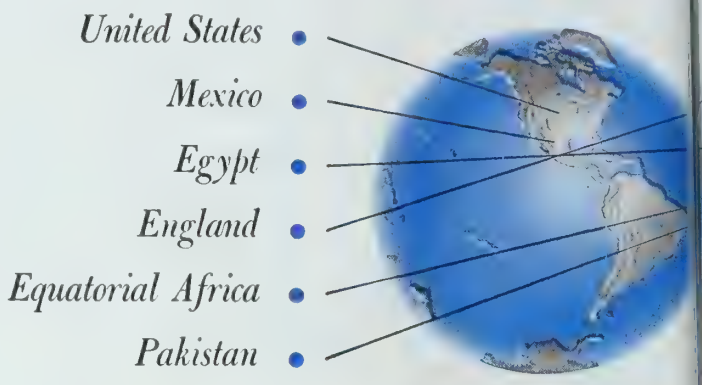
PEOPLE ARE PEOPLE THE WORLD OVER

FRANCE: A typical summer dinner for the Redouins consists of potato soup, salt pork, potatoes and cabbage, tomato salad with hard-boiled egg, fruit and vin rosé. However, since they had invited the JOURNAL photographer, Madame also cooked braised duck.

CHINA: The family of Ho Fu-yuan live in one of the best rice districts of China, so they are more prosperous than average. Even so, affluence simply means having more side dishes, here eggplant, bean curd, fish and pork, with which to vary the rice diet.



CZECHOSLOVAKIA: It doesn't take the hungry little Baloghs long to empty their bowls of soup. The family is fond of chicken and there are a dozen different Slovakian ways to make dumplings. The wines and plum brandy (slivovice) of this region are famous.

EQUATORIAL AFRICA: Etiquette in Equatoria consists of washing hands carefully before eating and pausing for a signal from father, Zamba Aluma (center), before digging into the porridge. Zamba's two wives and daughters dine separately (background), eating from a bowl on the ground.

THIS IS HOW

HOUR by hour the world grows hungry, and finally halts its work to eat. In their weather-beaten German farmhouse the Stieglitzes dine on vegetable soup, salt pork and boiled potatoes, dark bread and cider. In summer, the Redouins, of France, set the table under the big tree in the barnyard, and while they eat, their chickens peck for crumbs. In distant China the meals are meager, and the Ho Fu-yuans eke out their rice bowl with such side dishes as are available—dried fish, sweet pork, pickled vegetables, soybeans. In Italy, Grandmother Guercini starts her hungry harvest hands on minestrone and then fraggioli, homemade salami, dark bread, sheep's cheese, and Chianti made from home-grown grapes. This is the day's big meal, and there is a prayer before the plates are filled.

Customs of the dinner table vary as the menu. In Japan, instead of grace the Okamotos say "Ita-da-ki-masu" ("I shall now partake of the meal") before digging in. Mrs. Okamoto considers it a compliment if a guest belches during the meal. Rice is never served by a male; that is a woman's job. In Equatorial Africa, men and women eat separately, and the males of the Zamba Aluma family have the added privilege of eating off a table. The Pratts, of Iowa, hold the fork in the right hand;

EGYPT: The el Gamel boys are trained to sit straight at the table and keep quiet before their parents. They have meat-and-vegetable soup, stewed meat and rice, white cheese, watermelon and battaw, a crisp home-baked bread. On special occasions there are sweet cakes and soft drinks.

ENGLAND: Like many farm fam ilies, the Hiatts eat most meal in the kitchen. This dinner con sisted of roast chicken (a rar the Hiatts, of England, hold it in the left. In the Mexican and Pakistan households, fingers take the place of forks and chopsticks.

Men live by rice in the Orient, by wheat in the Western world. Fruits and vegetables are seldom bought if not home-grown. The basic beverage, judging by our families, is pulque in Mexico, tea in England, China and Japan, wine in France and Italy, coffee in Egypt and the U. S., ersatz coffee (rather than postwar beer) in Germany. Milk is of course the children's drink, but in four countries there is milk from mother only. On farms the world over meals are simple and filling. Yet Mrs. el Gamel, of Egypt, serves goose couscous, and M. Redouin, of France, brags about Madame's chicken casserole, seasoned with onions, mushrooms, garlic and parsley.

At any rate, few of our farm wives have to worry about leftovers. They may eat better than their city cousins, but farmers know firsthand what a sudden flood, a drought or plague of locusts means. They know that appetite can turn to hunger, hunger to famine. In Pakistan, the family of Mohamed Usman live no better than their ancestors of a thousand years ago—and can count on dying forty years before the Iowa Pratts. The belt of Asia is eternally tight and each notch means a million lives.

PHOTOGRAPHS for the Journal by Horace Bristol (Japan and China), Larry Burrows (England), Robert Capa (United States and Czechoslovakia), Marie Hansen (Italy), George Rodger (Egypt, Pakistan and Equatorial Africa), Phil Schultz (Mexico), David Seymour (France and Germany).

ITALY: Signora Guercini pours another glass of Chianti for Raffaello, the head of the family. Minestrone, rich with noodles, is ladled from the pot on the table. At dinner the men are apt to be serious with hunger, but the women frequently laugh and gossip.

MEXICO: Tortillas and beans constitute the starchy supper of the Gonzalez family, who eat on the floor of their adobe house, seated on wooden blocks. There is little milk for the children, but there are eggs in the basket over the hearth. Twice a week there is meat.

JAPAN: Mrs. Okamoto serves rice from the big wooden bucket and soup from a kettle behind it. As the mistress of the house, she is last to eat. There are seconds on rice but not on side dishes, as food is still scarce and severely rationed. There is meat twice a month.

For That Certain Thursday

BY ANN BATCHELDER

WELL, the year is running out. When November comes we've had the first frosts and the late corn, the sky is dull gray and the promise of winter is upon us. The dead leaves drifting down are the signs and symbols of what is to come. Of these things is the passing of time made. The year is on the wing. There's just one consoling thought—Thanksgiving Day comes in November.

Now you know and I know you know that I look forward to November for one reason. And one only. Way at the end of the list of days there's a certain Thursday I and most everyone else, I guess, look forward to. It is Thanksgiving. It comes only once in all the long calendar of days, the day of days that to my New England mind is best of all—the day that is New England where it began and has survived and always will. If the spirit that made it survives, and I guess it will. (Continued on Page 227)

I HAVE ACCEPTED CHARITY

IF I had known, ten years ago, where the path I was following would lead me, I might have lacked the courage to keep on. Ten years ago I was active, healthy, successful and, I believed, secure. I had just published a novel. The magazines were buying my short stories as fast as I could write them. Several pictures based on stories of mine were on the screen, and I was in demand on the radio and as a public speaker. My life was being lived at top speed. And the sources of my inspiration—and of my physical endurance—seemed inexhaustible.

Today I am living on charity. I am accepting, gratefully, a weekly check for thirty dollars, given me by a fund to which, in the past, I sometimes contributed.

Ten years ago I regarded money as my birthright; gracious living was part of the family tradition. I couldn't conceive of doing without certain luxuries. This was partly inheritance, but mostly habit. My expenses had increased over the years until it took all I could earn to keep pace with them. I was what storekeepers call a "wrap-up"—meaning I fell for sales talk, and purchased things I didn't really want because I felt superior to "haggling."

I was, too, unable to resist giving money to people who needed it. I wasn't a millionaire, but I behaved like one. Self-indulgence? Probably. I was always on the paying end of the check. I enjoyed being a Lady Bountiful. I loved it.

Yet in the back of my mind, there was a nagging fear; a presentiment of disaster. I postponed bringing it into the open, or looking it straight in the face. Instead, I convinced myself—almost—that there was no end to my capacity for work. Also, that I would never grow any older. For years I looked younger than I was; the mirror was my worst enemy. People said, "It's impossible to believe you're forty." Or fifty. All the way to fifty-five—when the compliments faded out, and I realized that it was a whole lot later than I thought!

In order to have the things I wanted, and to do the things that made me happy, I worked very hard indeed. Writing for a living is an arduous business. It calls for a certain abnegation; the deliberate putting aside of human companionship for hours, months, years at a time. I was forever locked in a room, struggling with an obdurate intelligence, conniving with my wits to see me through.

It takes courage to free-lance—unless, that is, you have some other source of income. A hog farm. A motel. A service station. Or a husband! When a story failed to sell, I always suffered a sort of shocked bewilderment, as if an unreasonable wrong had been done me. To conceal my deadly fear, I blamed the editors for lack of taste, or my agents for having let me down. Unfortunately, I had very few failures. It was easy, between shocks, to ignore the danger I was in. If someone I knew had to go to the hospital, or owed a year's rent, I simply wrote another short story.

"How easily you do it!" they cried.

Whenever I tired of my year-old car, I turned it in on a new one. I lived in a house that sapped my bank account like a vacuum cleaner. I gave away wearable clothes. There were flowers in my garden, yet I had a standing order at a florist's for out-of-season freesias, lilies, bouvardias, white carnations and yellow roses.

I never had much of a bank balance, and there were times when I had to borrow in order to pay my grocer. While the interest mounted, I went about in a creative frenzy, trying to grab plots out of the air. The sensation was, I imagine, like being on a tightrope over Niagara! Each time I made it safely, I'm afraid I forgot to thank God.

In this hazardous way, for twenty-five years I managed to keep intact the pattern of my days. Each morning I found myself in my lovely room. My breakfast tray was brought to my bed. There were expensive creams and lotions in the bathroom. Negligees and slippers. A closetful of clothes. The big, shining car at my disposal. A way, always, of meeting the needs of those who seemed to need me.

"How much?"

"Could you make it five hundred?"

"Certainly. And this isn't a loan, remember. I'm giving it to you."

The hazards of the path I followed were compensated for—or so I told myself—by beauty, tranquillity, freedom. It was my belief that home was a fortress, a place of refuge, a place for dreams and selfhood as well as for work.

A mere collection of articles, objects, the clutter of "possessions" had no interest for me. But, very often, the inanimate chair or table or piece of china—because of its place in the home—assumed a dearness, an almost symbolic value. Books. Records. Pictures. The familiar clockfaces and radio dials. The electric toaster. The silver spoons that belonged to great-grandmother. Bits of linen, embroidered and initialed, brought from Italy. Everything in my home had its special dearness. Home itself was so important to me that I was willing to spend my deepest reserves of physical and mental strength to keep it together.

I had what is known as a "career," yet the constant repetition of my name in print, the bulging press books, the fan mail, the flattery, added up to just one thing: I could go on living as I felt I had to live in order to be happy.

I am trying, in this article, to tell the truth. It would make a better story if I were to say, just here, that I wasn't happy. But I was. Save

"When you are attuned to success, failure catches you defenseless.

In dreadful sequence you first invent alibis;

then redouble your efforts; then hide."

By Mildred Cram

Having known the peaks of material success and the depths of despair, Mildred Cram faces the future with a wealth entirely spiritual.

for the presence of fear at the back of my mind, I had a wonderful time. We were a large family; we enjoyed one another; we admired one another; we were superior, we felt, to time and to change.

And I always had one more story in reserve when the going was tough! I could always slam the door shut in the leering face of my personal demon and pretend that he wasn't there. I have paid cruelly, and late, for that illusion. I never retreated from responsibility, but I did fly from the truth. My intentions were always honest—toward others. I cheated myself. I was growing careless as I made my precarious journeys across the rapids.

Then war separated the family. Long illness and death came next. The cable across Niagara began to sag. And, suddenly, there weren't any new stories! I began to lose faith in myself.

And so, simultaneously, did the editors. I sold less and less. Two years. Three.

What, exactly, had happened? I was an unbeatable technician. The work I did during those years was as "professional" as ever. But fear sat at my elbow as collaborator and there vanished from my work the lighthearted certainty which had made it popular. I floundered. And lost my balance.

When you are attuned to success, failure catches you defenseless. In dreadful sequence you first invent alibis; then redouble your efforts; then hide; finally enter the last refuge: "I can't!" And there, blocked by panic, bewildered and hunted, you sense defeat is possible.

This, for a profligate and arrogant soul like mine, is a devastating realization.

The processes of material failure are too familiar to set down in detail. As my earnings dwindled, I clung stubbornly to the outward semblances of solvency. The old Peter-to-pay-Paul routine! A member of my family required long hospitalization, and so I mortgaged the car. And the day came, inevitably, when the bank drove the car away. As from my window I watched the shining beauty vanish for the last time around the corner, I knew that the keystone of my precious arch of illusion had cracked.

I had often accused others of "mooching." Now, here was "me" hitching rides. Being artful and ingratiating because I had to get to town. There were moments of bitter rebellion, when I remembered the countless lifts I had given others. I heard myself saying, "Thank you," and waiting on the whims and obligations of my friends in order to get home again. Apology began to slip into my conversation; the dreadful, shameful need to explain my predicament.

I then mortgaged my furniture to my landlord, in order to gain six months, during which I planned to write a serial novel.

Now I was doing my own cooking, nursing a bedridden mother, keeping up the usual high polish on the house (which no longer belonged to me), looking out for my pets, a garden, and fending off an army of surprised local creditors.

I worked long and late, but what I put down on those five hundred pages of clean white paper I now hate to remember! It was a novel, but a bad one. Into it, hocked for peanuts, went my square-cut diamond, my moonstone, my sable furs, my pearl earrings and a topaz bracelet. My publisher wired "Impossible," and back it came from all those magazines which had published my stuff for twenty-five years.

I am not a physical coward. I don't think I'm really afraid of death, or of Nature, or of blood. But I admit that when the cupboard and the refrigerator stood empty, I almost lost my nerve. What could I do to earn a living? At fifty-eight, with an epic blood pressure and broken arches, congenitally incapable of adding or subtracting? All I knew how to do was what I'd been doing!

And so, gritting my teeth, I wrote three novelettes. Also, I hung on the long-distance phone to Hollywood, begging for a job. But Hollywood was having its own English-tax troubles.

Once, the day before Christmas, a great light broke and I thought we wouldn't starve, after all. Tyrone Power appeared at my door, bringing a great wicker basket full of delicacies—jams, candies, pâtés, exotic soups and wines and biscuits—rejoicing that his studio was about to buy a little book of mine and that he, Tyrone, was to make it! We were to go to Italy and to Chamonix to shoot it. Yes, I was to go! It was all settled. And he was glad because the little book had meant much to him during the war.

I sat shivering with relief and trying to get a prayer of gratitude through to God—trying to formulate a new sort of "thank you." My hands were like ice. Happiness should have overwhelmed me; instead, I wanted to cry.

The next day, exultantly, I phoned all my creditors and told them it would be only a few days now, and how kind and forbearing and patient they had been, and I hoped they'd forgive me.

However, Tyrone's studio changed its mind. And, one by one, the novelettes bounced, like bad checks.

Then the landlord sold the house. And there I was, adding a new word to my personal vocabulary: destitute. (Continued on Page 119)

Kitchen With a Future . . . .

GUIDE FOR PLANNING KITCHENS NEW OR OLD

- Counters for working and cabinets for storage should be placed next refrigerator, range and sink, so food, supplies and utensils are kept where used.
- Arrange kitchen so food preparation starts at counter near refrigerator where supplies are stored and moves, production-line fashion, toward range.
- Locate sink between refrigerator and range—water then available for use at both. Mid-position convenient for collecting utensils to be washed.
- Counter space between sink bowl and refrigerator for best working conditions should be 5 feet minimum—5½ feet maximum.
- Counter space between sink bowl and range—3 feet minimum, 4 feet maximum.
- Storage space should be adjusted to the maximum number who will live in the house.

IT was a nice day. The little red-brick Cape Cod cottage looked rosy and fresh, and the raw earth around it had dried out from last night's thunderstorm. The contractor's signs were still up, packing cases stood by the low back door. The neighbor's children dawdled past: a new house is always exciting!

Inside, furniture was piled around and lamps tripped the unwary. For the G.'s had just gotten back from their honeymoon and moving in was decidedly under way.

We went through the house, which is a four-room one with two unfinished bedrooms and bath upstairs. There is also a downstairs bathroom, which will be a convenience forever, although one of the present first-floor bedrooms will be the future dining room. I liked this plan exceedingly, for this room may in the future serve a triple purpose—dining room, extra space for the children's homework and parties, or a general family room with a built-in bed unit for an extra guest. In a small house every inch counts.

But of course I mainly wanted to hang around the kitchen, which was completely finished, and so did the new lady of the house. For as the kitchen goes, so goes the life of the house.

It is a gay young kitchen for a gay young couple, but the most important thing is that by planning, they have every convenience they will ever need, and they will have the use of them through the years and really save money by having them now. Instead of paying rent, the G.'s are investing in a house of their own. This is the time when it pays to use credit, when you are young and your earning capacity is on the way up.

But what interested me most was that they had figured the costs and knew what they were about. The house alone, without the lot it stands on, with complete wiring, lighting, electric water heater and forced warm air heating system, cost $15,900. This even included special lamps to kill air-borne bacteria. (This last seemed a little unnecessary to me, because my life with unkilled air-borne bacteria has been terribly healthy for some time! However, such things weren't available when I was a bride, and I admit to having occasional colds and more than a touch of sinus.)

At retail prices in June their complete laundry and kitchen equipment and cabinets, even including the ventilating fan, cost about $1500.

When I figured the cost of the remodeling I have done and seen done, and the hopeless years of waiting, I thought that these young people were very smart. The extra cost of having everything the heart desires while the heart is young was a relatively small part of the whole cost. Besides, there was a real financial advantage in including all "improvements" in the original planning and including them in the mortgage with 10 years to pay. There was no extravagance in their (Continued on Page 195)

The kitchen, first room in the house to be completed, will measure up in the years to come as the needs of the family increase.

BY GLADYS TABER

- Counters connecting appliances save cabinet, add convenience. (Door between sink and range in similar kitchen increased cabinet costs by 9% to avoid isolating appliances.)

- Continuous counters save time and steps. Identical meals of meat, mashed potatoes, vegetable, salad, bread and butter, pie and coffee were prepared in this kitchen and similar one with doorway between range and sink. In kitchen without continuous counters, it took 8% longer—24% more steps. On a thousand meals a year good planning pays daily dividends.

Although the eating corner is in the kitchen, it has a gay atmosphere of its very own.

Nine a Day

BY ANN BATCHELDER

1 Now the leaves have left the trees, but not the garden walks. But the last leaf on the tree is still there, hanging on for dear life. That's the leaf I love. Hangs high too.

2 A thought for the day. Hot clam-and-tomato bouillon served in cups, with a very thin slice of tomato and one of lemon floated on the top. What the milliners call "a pretty conceit."

3 When asparagus goes you start pining for it. But no more. Frozen or canned, both are all set. Instead of hollandaise sauce try a thin cream sauce, well fortified with riced hard-cooked egg, seasoned, and garnished with paprika.

4 If someone should give you one of those small hams that are cured to a fare-you-well, carve it paper thin and, for one thing, spread the slices with soft cheese. Sprinkle with chopped chives. This is a delicious appetizer.

5 Up and down the country roads you see the sign "Bar-B-Cue." Unless you've got a flat tire or a complete emptiness inside, better drive on. But this is November, and a fine time for barbecued spareribs by your own fireside.

6 Far be it from me to cheer for a beet. But take some tiny little canned beets, chill them to the bone, drain them well, toss them in salted sour cream and serve in lettuce cups, chilled to just this side of freezing, and serve with fish, and even I—yes, even I!

7 Want something special to serve with ice cream or homestead pudding? (Remember that?) Take large glass dishes of shredded candied ginger set in lemon jelly, and don't say I never told you.

8 The chafing dish lighted on the silver tray on a Sunday supper table or buffet, with hard-cooked eggs and big pink shrimps or lobster meat in a piping-hot Newburg sauce—on buttered toast or red-hot muffins. Well, I would be glad to drop in any Sunday night.

9 For a little this or that, a bit on the surprise side (not, my dears, as a main course), put big, beautiful walnut halves stuffed and put together with anchovy paste. Try those on male or female.

10 Now the Welsh-rarebit season is four-square upon us. In sandwiches this is marvelous done this way: Spread the mixture between slices of white bread, dip them in egg and milk as for French toast and fry them to an autumn-leaf brown. Keep them small. Serve hot.

11 Omelet lore—short and snappy. Keep an omelet pan for omelets only. Don't yank it out and fry potatoes in it. Use unsalted butter, if you can get it, and be sparing of it. Any filling goes in just before folding the omelet. Serve hot. Two eggs to a person.

12 A little marjoram mixed with the salt and pepper rubbed on a steak before broiling saves many a grouch and may mean sables come Christmas.

13 Some may sneer, but I'm here to testify that tender, perfectly cooked macaroni, lush with a sauce so adroitly seasoned that only one who knows can do it, with browned little meat balls swimming in its depths, is a dish that men yearn for and seldom get. Women too. There's not much difference in tastes, or so I find.

14 Spareribs, beautifully crusted, big baked potatoes, tomatoes stuffed and baked, fried apples in brown sugar and cinnamon, and mince pie and cheese. There's a man's meal.

15 Tournedos of Beef Epicurean. Take little fillets of beef. Grill rare, cover with a Bernaise sauce, decorate with a grilled mushroom, garnish with slivered and buttered green beans and julienne potatoes. Ask anything better?

16 Nothing devised by man or cook can compare with a sweetbread soufflé. When something as delicate, perfect and priceless is set before a king, may I be queen—or whatsoever in waiting.

17 Lobster bouchées (I didn't invent spelling, or gunpowder either) go with the soup or salad meal. Fill little puff-paste shells with creamed lobster. Garnish with lemon and water cress.

18 Braised endive is braised as ever and—here's the gimmick—add sliced sweet onions fried with care; and anoint with a little hot sour cream and minced chives, and eat endive as never was.

19 You've heard of, read of and eaten wild rice, I hope. Do you know about wild-cranberry jelly? Any cranberry jelly, wild or tame, is wonderful with pheasant, duck and other wild birds.

20 Gentle hints for any Gertie: Don't overcook oysters. . . . Deep-fat frying is tops of all top-of-the-stove cooking. Don't hurry it. Take it easy. . . . The cook who washes vegetables in warm or hot water ought to be made to eat them. . . . And the candidate for oblivion is the guy who poured mayonnaise on an alligator pear. Well, that's all for now.

21 Green grapes frosted in beaten egg white and fine sugar to decorate a fruit cup is a sophisticated touch and pretty as a starlet on a front cover.

22 Calf's liver, done well by, is a divine dish. Never fail to soak it at least half an hour in milk before frying or broiling. You'll see how right I am.

23 Ever essay ("try" is what I mean) popovers? Or do yours pop under? Always use general-purpose flour, and try salad oil for shortening. Best cook in the world let me in on that last item.

24 Speaking of popovers, by the way, take out any fringes and remnants from within and fill the shells with creamed chicken or chipped beef.

25 Here is an Italian variation on the well-known theme of biscuits. When mixing them, add to the flour-and-baking-powder mixture (for twelve biscuits) one teaspoon of onion salt and two tablespoons of grated Parmesan cheese. Then go ahead as usual. These are elegant, hot and well buttered.

26 You might make up some delicious chicken or turkey hash, and put it in individual casseroles or small au gratin dishes. Decorate each au gratin with a slice of broiled tomato, then flatter the whole thing by adding a poached egg.

27 Crushed almonds add a lot to cream of chicken soup, and you can say that again.

28 A baked apple served in a meringue shell, topped with whipped or ice cream puts this dessert in the upper brackets.

29 Add half a cup washed seedless raisins to your regular receipt for cranberry sauce. Especially good with pork.

30 These are no melancholy days. These are the great days of the year, and that greatest of all is coming—the mince-pie-and-turkey day. I guess we'll wangle through, no matter who builds the next porch on the White House.

At this Mary lost her temper. "I can see that. You think of a lot of men."

Tears rolled down Lili's cheeks.

"What shall I tell him?" Mary asked. "I've got to tell him something, Lili."

Lili was silent for a moment. Then she looked askance at Mary. "Tell him—tell him—I write very soon." She clapped her hands and laughed. Then she got up from the couch. "I have to go with baba and ma to tea at the consulate. I much rather sit here with you and listen to the letter all over again. But I must go—they tell me to." She smiled lovingly at Mary, and as firmly as though Lili had laid her hands upon her, Mary felt herself pushed from the room.

In his room, at the end of a hot day, James read Mary's letter. She confessed that she ought to have waited for a few days until her anger was cooled. "But you know how hard it is for me to wait," she said, "and especially when it has to do with you. Jim, Lili did not say she would not marry you or that she was going to marry anyone else. She just said she had many things to consider."

James folded the letter. It was a long letter, covering many pages, and Mary had put into it family news and scraps of gossip about their friends. By now the family would be in the cool green hills of Vermont. He thought with homesickness of the winds fragrant with pines. Yet he knew now that here was where he must stay. He was a doctor first, and he was already entangled in the needs of the people who came to the hospital in terror and desperation. No one came unless death was the alternative, and a dozen operations in a day was routine. The hospital was understaffed. American doctors had not yet returned and the Chinese doctors trained abroad were constantly being tempted to easier jobs. It took courage to operate when the death of an already dying person might mean a lawsuit, if he were a rich general or a millionaire.

> I have never been hurt by anything I didn't say.
> —CALVIN COOLIDGE

In his growing anger against the rich he found himself turning to the poor who came to the clinics and crowded the charity wards. At first their urgency had confused him and even made him angry. But now he knew they could not help crying out to him. They had endured so much and there were so many of them. "I am here," he said quietly. "I will not go away until I have seen each one of you." Only when they found that they could trust his word did they become quiet.

What angered and discouraged him most profoundly was the callousness of his own colleagues to the ills of people who came to them for healing. Not all of them, he granted grudgingly. Dr. Liu Chen would be an honor to any hospital, and he learned always to call upon one or another of three nurses, Rose Mei, Kitty Sen and Marie Yang. All nurses had foreign names and used them carefully, just as they spent half a week's salary on permanent waves at the hands of a White Russian hairdresser.

MUCH of his private thought went into the angry pondering over this callousness of his fellows. "I may as well tell you that there is too much here that is rotten," he wrote to Mary. "I suppose this is partly because we are an old people and much dead wood has not been cut away. There is decay here—I cannot find out just where, but I see it in doctors like Su and Kang and Peng and others. It is even in the nurses. Money sticks to every hand. Well, it sticks to many hands in America too. I somehow feel I have no home in the world."

In this letter he said nothing about Lili, and reading it in the solitude of her own room, Mary rejoiced. It had come to her at a moment when she herself was restless. The summer in the Vermont mountains had filled her with health and energy which as yet had no purpose. She had no lover. She had rejected with some disgust a young Chinese journalist who had pursued her. To any an American would have been as romance provincial love of her own country.

She had quarreled all summer with Lou when she found that this younger sis moped when the mail was delayed. It mot taken too long to discover that Lou read a letter from Estelle almost as eage as she read the less frequent ones from Phil Mary had taken Louise for a walk when discovered thus, and upon a path fragra with pine trees in the sun faced her sis

"Louise, don't be a fool."

Louise had blushed.

"Your face is red." Mary said. "You silly, Louise. Do you think Philip will mar a Chinese girl? His father and mother w not allow it."

"Who talked about marriage?" Louise began to walk on quickly.

"I hope you are not thinking of anyth else, Louise." She seized her sister's ha "Louise, do not forget—we are not Am ican. We cannot behave like American girl

LOUISE pulled her hand away. "Let alone," she cried, and suddenly she began run down the path and Mary had not pu sued her. She had sat down on a log and ting long alone, she had tried to think wh she should do.

In the end, after the family had come ba to the city, she had talked to Peter, but had been scornful.

"It doesn't matter what Louise does he told her. "Louise is already spoiled."

"Peter, what do y mean?"

Peter had laughed at h look. "Perhaps they ha not slept together, if th is what scares you. No if Philip wanted Louise would go to him."

"You mean that you have talked w him about Louise?" Mary asked.

Peter looked unwilling. Mary and breakfasted early and usually alone, a they were talking in the dining room bef their parents had come down. "I saw h kiss her one day."

"No!" Mary whispered. "Did Louise him?"

Peter grinned. "She helped."

"I shall tell pa," she said.

Peter shrugged his shoulders. "You ha always had too much courage." He had ris from the table at that, and had gone aw to his own affairs.

When Doctor Liang came down ten mi utes later he found his elder daughter loo ing preoccupied. He wondered if she w thinking about some young man. Her ma riage was the subject of frequent conversa tion between him and Mrs. Liang. He in tended as soon as he saw a suitable you man to make the proper preliminary ap proaches. Now, observing his daughter pretty face and figure, it occurred to h that he ought not to delay too long.

"Good morning, pa," Mary said.

"Good morning," he replied. He sat dow and sipped the glass of orange juice at h plate.

"Pa, I don't want to tell you this at brea fast because I know you like quiet, but must tell you before ma comes down. Lou is in love with Philip."

Doctor Liang looked surprised. "Who Philip."

"You know, pa; he is Estelle's brother Estelle Morgan."

"An American!"

"Yes, pa. She has let him kiss her."

Doctor Liang suddenly pushed the dish oatmeal away. "Mary, do you know of wh you accuse your sister?"

"I thought you ought to know. Shall tell ma?"

"Tell me what?" Mrs. Liang came in the room, her full eyelids still a little swoll with sleep. "Eh, Liang—is the oatme burned again?"

"No—it is something even worse."

"Who has done something?" Mrs. Liang demanded.

"Your youngest daughter," he said severely. "She has allowed an American man to become . . . familiar."

"Oh, pa, I didn't say that," Mary cried.

"It is the same thing." He looked at his wife. "I always said that you allowed this girl too much of her own way. She comes and goes as if she were not Chinese. She is not respectful. Now she insults even our ancestors."

"Oh, pa," Mary said softly.

"Do not interrupt me," he replied. "And leave the room, if you please. This is for your mother and me to discuss alone." He waited until Mary had closed the door and then he began to speak in Chinese. "You," he said, "you! I told you to watch the girls."

Mrs. Liang began to cry. "How can I watch them?"

"They do not obey you. You should tell them what they must do and what they must not do. What will people say when they hear that our daughters behave like wantons? They will say that our Confucian ways cannot withstand the ways of barbarians."

Mrs. Liang wiped her eyes and puckered her lips. "Why then did you come here, Liang? At home it would be easy to watch the girls. I could hire amahs to go with them everywhere."

Doctor Liang pushed back his chair. "When Louise comes downstairs, send her to my study," he commanded.

He refused to finish his meal and he walked with dignity out of the room and across the hall to his study and closed the door. Once alone, he allowed himself to be as disturbed as he felt. He sat down in his easy chair, closed his eyes, and let his anger against Louise swell to a point where it would be properly explosive. There he maintained it by force of will while he read again his morning portion of the Analects.

MEANWHILE Louise had tripped downstairs barefoot, still wearing her nightgown, over which she had thrown a pink satin bed jacket. "Oh, ma," she said, "I am so hungry, but I don't want to get up. I thought maybe Nellie would bring me up a tray."

"Your pa wants to see you," her mother said coldly.

"Why, what have I done?"

Mrs. Liang frowned. "Péi!" she said. "Think what it is that you do not want him to know!"

Louise looked alarmed. "Who told him?"

"Never mind."

Doctor Liang opened the door suddenly. Both women looked at him, but he stared only at his daughter. "Go upstairs and put on your clothes. Then come to my study."

"Isn't she to eat something first?" Mrs. Liang demanded.

"No," Doctor Liang said and shut the door.

Mother and daughter looked at each other. Then Mrs. Liang spoke. "Go upstairs. I will fetch you a tray."

"Scrambled eggs, please," Louise whispered.

Doctor Liang, listening, heard only the hurrying footsteps of his daughter on the stairs. He leaned back, mollified. He was still obeyed.

Upstairs, Louise did not go to her own room. Instead she opened the door of Mary's. Mary was at her desk, writing to James, and she saw her younger sister, the wide satin skirt of her nightgown whirled around her, and her pretty face pink with anger.

"Mary, what did you say to pa?"

"Peter told me you let Philip kiss you," Mary said gravely.

Louise stared at her sister. Something adamant in that soft little face confounded her and she suddenly began to cry. "I hate you!" she sobbed and she opened the door and flew out.

Mary sat for a long moment, then took up her pen again. "I think the only thing that can keep Louise from being a fool is for me to bring her to China. If the ocean is between her and Philip perhaps we can guard her."

Another "Hickory" Success

When she had finished her letter she sat quite thoughtfully for a long time. Then she got up and began to tidy the small drawers at the top of her bureau. In something over half an hour, she heard the unmistakable sounds of a stick beating upon something soft. Then she heard screams—Louise's voice—and almost at once her mother's loud shouts. She ran downstairs swiftly and opened the door of her father's study. He had his Malacca cane in one hand, and with the other he held Louise by the hair. Mrs. Liang was vainly trying to put herself between the cane and the girl.

"My father!" Mary said distinctly.

Doctor Liang's face was twisted and purple. But at the sight of his elder daughter he threw down the cane and pushed Louise away from him.

"Take her out of my sight," he gasped. "I never want to see her again."

Louise lay on the floor where she fell, sobbing aloud, and Mrs. Liang sat down in a chair. Sweat was pouring down her cheeks and she lifted the edge of her coat to wipe it away.

"Father," Mary said again. The intense quiet of her voice seemed to bring silence and order into the room. "What you have done is not right."

Doctor Liang had thrown himself into his leather armchair. "She is no longer my daughter," he said. He looked with contempt upon Louise where she still lay weeping, her face buried in her arms.

"The American girls kiss boys and think nothing of it," Mary pleaded. "Remember that she has been here all her life."

"It is not only the kiss," Mrs. Liang said heavily. "There is more than the kiss."

A woman's lot is made for her by the love she accepts. —GEORGE ELIOT.

"What has she done?"

Doctor Liang's face began to work in strange grimaces. "Everything for which I have striven is now destroyed," he said. "I am about to be disgraced by my own daughter. My enemies will laugh at me. My students will deride the teachings of Confucius because my own daughter has derided them."

Mary was sorry for them all. She stood with pity warm in her dark eyes. She understood her father's pride and her mother's bewilderment. And she understood very well Louise, who in eagerness to make herself beloved had confounded herself more than any.

"Pa," Mary said gently, "I have thought of something. Let me take her back to China."

"Two girls!" Mrs. Liang exclaimed.

"Pa, James is your oldest son. Let him help you. I was about to ask you anyway if you would let me keep his house for him until he marries. Let me take Louise with me."

Louise turned her face. "I won't go—I won't go!" she wailed.

Doctor Liang's jaw tightened and two small muscles stood out on his cheeks. "If you do not want to go, then I say you shall go! We will have no peace until you are gone!"

"Liang!" his wife cried. "You cannot send two girls alone across the ocean!"

"Peter shall go with them," Doctor Liang cried. "Let them all go!" He slapped his outspread hands upon the desk, and then to the horror of his family he began to weep silently.

Mary stooped to her sister. "Come—get up," she said. "We must leave pa alone."

When the door closed behind them Mrs. Liang rose and went to her husband. She stood behind him where she could not see his face and she put out her two hands and with the tips of her fingers she began to rub his temples rhythmically. He sighed and leaned his head back against her breast.

"You must not blame them too much," she said. "They are like plants growing in a foreign soil. If they bear strange flowers, it is the soil that is evil."

"You know that I cannot . . . go back," he said listlessly.

"I know that."

"I cannot do my work there," he went on. "What place is there for a scholar in the midst of chaos and war?"

"None."

He pulled away from her suddenly. "I suppose you wish you could go with the children," he said. "You will be lonely here with only me."

She stood motionless. "Liang—would you not go too?"

"How can I? I have classes about to begin. Besides, how can I earn my living in China—unless I become an official?"

"You could become an official."

"No, I cannot," he said loudly. "I can do a great many things for the sake of peace and our ancient civilization—but I cannot do that."

She waited another long moment. She turned her head and looked out the window at all the things she hated. She hated high buildings and tall chimneys and bustling streets. But her love for him was still greater than her hatred of these things, although she did not understand him even in the least part of his being.

"If you cannot go, I will stay with you," she said, "and I will not be lonely."

Upstairs in her room, Mary faced Louise. Her father's Confucian teaching of calm under all circumstances had become her conscience. Now, feeling her cheeks hot and her eyes burning, she nevertheless tried to keep her voice gentle.

"Louise, what have you done?" she demanded. "You had better tell me so that I can help you."

"I don't want your help," Louise pouted.

"Nevertheless, I must help you," Mary said in the same steadfast voice. "What did you tell pa that made him so angry?"

Tears came into Louise's eyes. What had seemed only a sweet exciting secret when she was with Estelle now became a frightful thing when she was besieged by her family. "I told him—I told him ——"

"Go on," Mary commanded.

"When he said—when he said—he would never consent to—to an American son-in-law ——" She began now to cry in good earnest.

"You said ——"

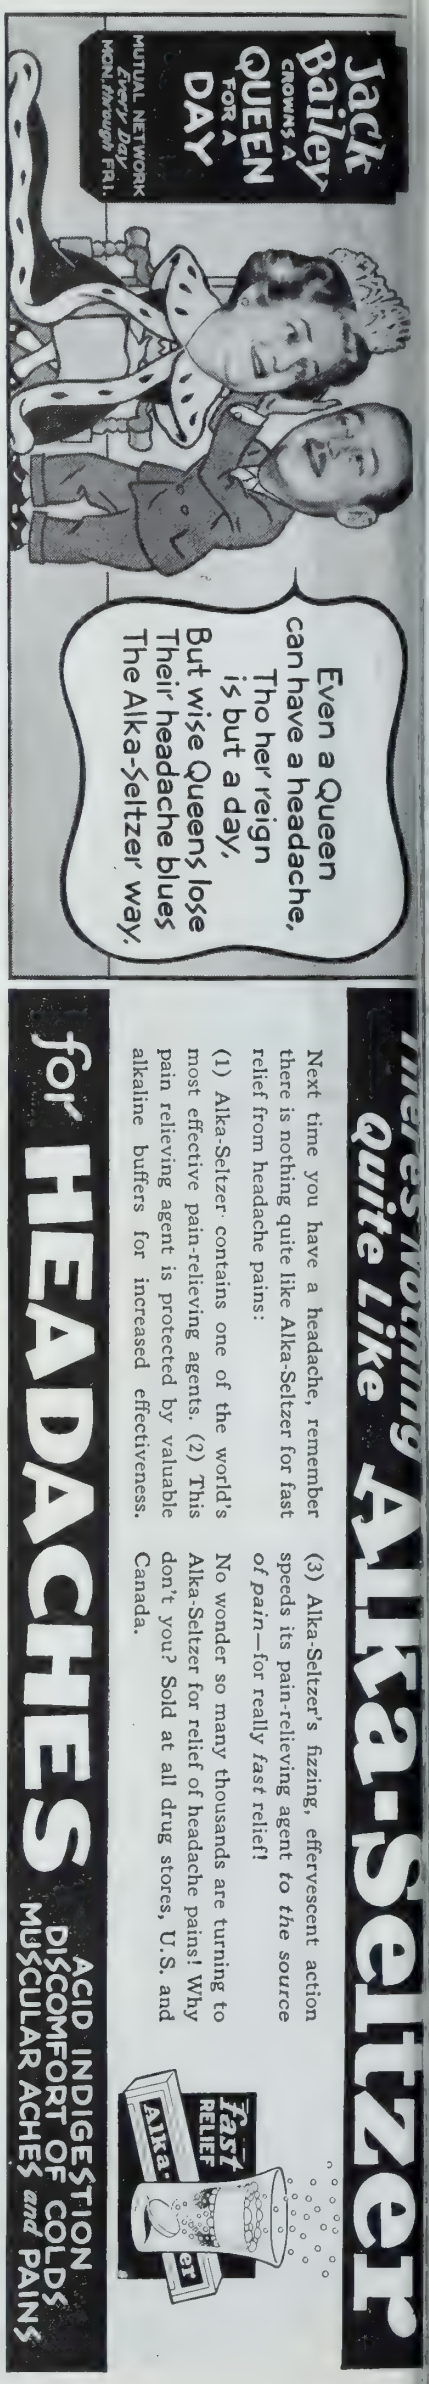
"I said it was too late!" The words came out of Louise in one burst.

"You haven't married Philip secretly!"

Louise shook her head. "No. But I can never marry anybody else—because—because ——"

Mary sat quite still, gazing at Louise, who flung herself face down on the bed and sobbed aloud. Always, as the elder sister, Mary had gone to her to soothe and comfort her. But now she did not move. She felt sick and she did not want to touch Louise. She rose, not able to endure her own sickness, and she went to the closet and took out a dress for the street.

Louise looked sidewise at her in the midst of her weeping. "Where are you going?"



"Outdoors," Mary said. "I want to be alone."

Louise broke into a fresh wail. "Aren't you going to help me?"

Mary's hand was on the door, but she paused. "Yes, I will help you, but just now I don't know how. I shall have to think."

She walked slowly toward the river, biting her lips and trembling as she went. What could she do, indeed? Her parents, she knew, were worse than useless. They would be utterly bewildered. She felt profoundly lonely without her elder brother, the only person in the family with whom she could communicate. Since he had gone, she had scarcely spoken to anyone beyond the casual talk of small necessities.

Now her pent-up heart demanded frankness, and she began to think of Philip. He, too, was a part of this, and he ought to know what he had done to their family. A Chinese girl was part of her family, and what happened to her brought its weight upon them all. She ought to go and talk to Philip. James was not here, and Peter was too young, and so she must do it, for obviously her father would not so lower himself. He would say, and perhaps rightly, that Louise was to blame because the woman is always to blame.

She sighed and crossed the street to a drugstore. A moment later Philip's fresh tenor voice came over the wires.

"Philip Morgan?"

"Yes."

"This is Mary Liang. Could you—may I talk with you for a few minutes? Not over the telephone, I mean. It's—it's quite important."

A second passed, then two and three before he answered. "Yes, of course, Mary. Only it just happens that I have to meet my father. He's waiting at the office for me."

"If I got into a taxi, could we drive down together?"

There was the second's pause again. "All right, Mary."

In ten minutes she drew up before the quiet house in Sutton Place, and then she saw Philip come out the door.

"Hello, Mary."

"Hello."

"Stays hot, doesn't it?" he asked, trying to be hearty.

"Yes," she replied. Then she took her heart in her hands. "Philip," she began impetuously, "I have to hurry because I know you haven't much time. But I must tell you that my father has found out about you and Louise. He is very angry. He has told her that she must go to China right away. But I want to know how you feel. I mean—if you are in love with Louise ——" Her face burned scarlet and she forced herself to look at Philip.

The wise know too well their weakness to assume infallibility; and he who knows most, knows best how little he knows.

—THOMAS JEFFERSON.

"I'm not in love—with anybody."

"Then why did you ——" she began, and could not go on. His profile was gentle and his lips were trembling. She felt rather sorry for him.

"I don't know how it happened," he stammered. "I like Louise awfully. We were all having too good a time, I guess."

"I suppose your family wouldn't want you to marry a Chinese girl, even if you did want to?"

"My mother wouldn't like it," Philip said huskily. "My dad is more . . . broad-minded. Of course we all like Louise awfully. She's pretty and smart and all that." There was no sign whatever of love in his voice or his eyes, and she grew angry enough to want to defend her sister.

"I suppose you don't know what you have done to our family," she said bitterly. "It is easy for you Americans, but for us—it just spoils her chances of a good marriage. I mean, it would have to be told."

"Gosh," he said miserably. "I'm sorry."

She wanted to wound him and she did not know how. "If it had been in the old times in China you'd both be killed," she went on.

"Gosh," he said again. "I guess we ought to be glad it's not old times."

To her surprise, when he said this she wanted to cry. He did not know what he had done and nothing could make him know because he had nothing with which to understand what he had done.

She leaned forward and tapped on the glass. "Let me out," she called to the driver. "I want to get out right here." She saw Philip's face, startled and concerned, looking at her through the glass as he whirled away.

On a warm September afternoon James was washing up after a leg amputation when the door opened and a hand thrust itself in, holding an envelope. It was that of young Wang, who was always afraid of seeing cutting and bleeding, and would on no account put his head into an operating room.

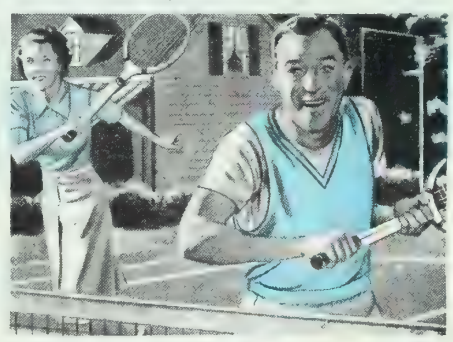
HOW TO LEAD A HAPPY, USEFUL LIFE WITH

DIABETES

Diabetes results from the body's failure to make proper use of sugars and starches. This occurs when something goes wrong with the system's natural supply of insulin.

Since the development of prepared insulin, many advances have been made in treating and controlling diabetes. There is now hope that radioactive "tracers" and other research will contribute to a greater understanding of this disease.



1. Today by utilizing current medical knowledge through close co-operation with the doctor, the average diabetic may look forward to living a happy, useful life.

2. Prepared insulin is sometimes used when the diabetic does not produce enough for his needs. New, slower-acting insulins make possible more accurate control of diabetes.

3. Diet determines the amount of sugar and starch taken into the body. In some cases, by balancing diet and exercise, diabetes can be controlled without added insulin.

4. Exercise helps keep blood sugar at a safe level by using up sugars and starches. Many diabetics, by following their doctor's advice, are able to continue their favorite sports.

Early discovery helps control diabetes

Since early diabetes has no obvious symptoms, discovery may come only when a doctor makes a urinalysis, and then, if necessary, a blood sugar test.

These tests are important for people most likely to get diabetes—those with a family history of the disease, and those who are overweight and past 40, particularly women. Everyone, however, should try to keep weight down, and to have a regular medical examination which includes a check-up for diabetes.

If diabetes is discovered, it is reassuring to note that with good medical supervision, the average diabetic is living much longer. At age 40, for example, his life expectancy is now more than twice what it was before insulin was discovered in 1921.

James opened the message. Even in a cablegram his father could not quite resist the careful phrase. "The other children joining you in our homeland. Sailing today. Explanations to follow by airmail." He looked at the date. They had sailed yesterday.

The other children. Mary he would have welcomed—but all three of them, so young, so unprepared! What would he do with them? It was too late to cable back in protest. That was like his father too.

"Bad news?" Dr. Liu Chen asked. He had come in to wash up also, having today taken the place of the anesthetist who had died a week ago of cholera.

"Not exactly," James said. Had it been one of the other doctors he would not have gone on, but Chen was comfortable and kind. He had been educated at a small college in the United States and afterward he had taken his internship at a settlement hospital which no one knew of when he mentioned it. "My father tells me he is sending my two sisters and my brother to me, and I cannot imagine why, since they are all in school."

Chen, very clean and smelling of soap, was now carefully sharpening a small scalpel on a fine oiled stone. "Perhaps he wishes them to have something of their own civilization."

"Perhaps," James said. He went on again, troubled, "The question is where I shall put them. I shall have to find a house somewhere."

"That is not too difficult, provided you do not want what is called a modern house." Doctor Liu put the scalpel carefully into the sterilizer and turned on the electricity. "I have invented a sterilizer to be used with charcoal," he said. His square ugly face lit with enthusiasm as he spoke.

Long ago Liu Chen had given up improving his looks. He came of peasant stock, and would still have been a peasant had it not been for a missionary who taught him to read and then helped him to go to school. He had a good mind which held tenaciously everything he poured into it, but nothing was learned easily. Somewhat too slow to be a first-rate surgeon, he made up for this by taking a deep personal interest in his patients. This was especially true with children. James knew that this strange, uncouth man was different from all the other doctors. He had a living spirit in him which he was able to impart to the sick and which was better than cold skill.

"I should like to see your sterilizer," James said now.

CHEN turned away and pretended to adjust something on the handle of the door of the instrument case. "Someday," he said. "Meanwhile, can I help you to find a house? I know one in the hutung two streets to the north of here. It is perhaps somewhat large, but it is cheap because it is haunted."

"Haunted?"

"Yes—by weasels," Chen replied.

James laughed. "I will go with you to see the house this evening."

So it was arranged, and he could only spend the rest of the day at his usual work, wondering and waiting for the letter which his father had promised, and which, since it came by air, would reach him before he had to meet his sisters and brother.

After his hours were over he met Chen at the hospital gate and the two men walked briskly along the street, unheeding of the cries of ricksha pullers beseeching them to ride. One such fellow fell into cursing when neither James nor Liu Chen turned to hire him.

"You!" he shouted after them. "You ought not to use your legs and rob us of our wages! Such as you make communists of us!"

The two men did not turn, but they heard this. "Do you know anything about the communists?" James asked.

"No," Chen said shortly. "Nobody knows anything about them."

He quickened his pace and turned a corner and they walked down a quiet lane between high brick walls.

"This is the hutung," he said. "The gate is yonder."

THEY stepped over a high lintel and into a deserted court where the weeds grew high between the stones. Once inside, Chen closed the door safely. Then he pulled his handkerchief from his pocket and wiped his face and his bare head.

"Eh!" he said in a low voice. "You must not ask a man in broad daylight what he knows about the communists. It made my sweat pour out."

"You mean ——"

"I do mean that indeed," Chen said quickly. "Come, let us see the house. It is too big for you, but you can shut away some of the courts. Or I might rent a little one for myself."

"That would be pleasant," James said.

Chen laughed. "If your sisters are pretty!"

James did not laugh and neither did he answer.

Almost at once Chen saw that he had offended. "No—no," he said quickly. "I was only joking. I could not afford it. I have old parents to support."

"Have you wife and children?" James asked.

Chen shook his head somewhat moodily. "No, I have no wife. I cannot take a peasant woman because I am too good for her. But I am too much peasant for any of these new women, do you see? I am caught between old and new—I have no home and perhaps I am to have none."

"I cannot believe that," James said. "It seems to me rather that you are the best of both kinds of people."

This simple praise moved Chen, and he coughed as though he were choking. "Come," he said. "We must see the house."

This house had been a very handsome one when it was built and the strong walls and the stout beams held. But the paint was peeling from the wood and the lime had blistered on the walls. The stone floors were covered with a coat of sand blown there by many windstorms. There were none of the things to which Mary and Louise and Peter were accustomed. There was no bathroom, no heating of any kind, no electricity, no running water. There was a well; there were four large courts which held some good trees, and a terrace with ancient peonies still living; there were twelve large rooms, three to each court and connected with outdoor passageways whose balustrades were finely carved. James stared about him and Chen watched him.

"It looks too bad, does it not?" Chen said. "Still, a few women hired to clean, and you will see a different house. You can buy a foreign stove at the Thieves' Market and a carpenter will make some beds and tables and the tailor some bedding. You will see how easily it can all be done, and how cheaply. But perhaps you have plenty of money."

"I have not," James said quickly. His father must send him money, of course, and yet how well he knew that his father would often forget! Peter must go to college and so must Louise. Mary could teach somewhere. Between them they could pay the daily bills. "I will take the house," he told Chen; "and mind you, if you want a room, you shall have it."

By now they had reached the inner court. It was quiet here and strangely peaceful. A great twisted pine stood against the house, and the walls held its fragrance, for no wind could reach here. Chen threw himself on the wild grass under the tree and James sat down beside him.

"You asked me about the communists," Chen said abruptly. "They have taken my own village, which is three hundred miles to the northwest. Therefore I do know something about them."

"Is your house safe?"

"Yes, for we are poor enough to be safe. My parents were tenants before the communists came. Their landlord was the usual sort, short-tempered, greedy, but not more than any others. When the communists came they strung him up by the thumbs and gave him a good beating and then allowed him as much land as he could work himself—no more. To my parents they gave a small farm. So now we are landowners!" Chen laughed dryly.

James smiled. "I suppose you like the communists."

Chen sat up and wrapped his arms about his knees. "No," he said, "no. Had I been only a peasant still, I dare say I would have been happy enough, but I am a doctor."

"Do they not want doctors?"

"THEY want them very much. They want them too much. They have offered me a great deal. But they cannot offer me enough." These words Chen spoke in short bitter sentences. He tugged at a clump of grass between two stones and it came up, root and all. "They wanted me to dip my hand in blood and swear something. Swear what? Nothing much: loyalty, brotherhood, eternal faith—all the usual oaths of a gang. But I have sworn my loyalties to all humanity. I told them so and they wanted to shoot me. So I left by night. Now you see why I have no home." Chen laughed a little wildly. He got up. "Come, let us settle the matter of this house! Its owner lives next door—a good old man who smokes opium, and he will give you a quick bargain for cash."

The days drew on and the expected letter from his father did not arrive. James was not surprised. He could imagine, as well as though he were in that New York apartment, how his father rose each morning, contemplating the writing of the letter, how after contemplation he postponed. From his mother, however, James did receive a letter, so rich with piety and good purpose that he was not able to discern from it what had happened—that it concerned Louise, that she had been foolish and led away by the Americans, that it was the elder brother's business to take the father's place and if James knew any nice young men and could arrange a marriage for Louise, undoubtedly that would be the solution, although he must not misunderstand and think that Louise had to get married —— James read it over thoughtfully three times and gathered that Louise was somehow a problem, as she had always been.

Without much enlightenment, therefore, he asked for a week's vacation and, with young Wang at his heels, he waited one day on the familiar pier in Shanghai for the steamship lighter. The day was windy and gray and the waterside was bleak. Small boats were pushing about, scavenging in the filthy river. Each had its family of man and woman and children and these looked cold and unhappy. He was sorry that the three who were coming to him must see the Bund on such a day. Even the tall modern buildings looked forbidding and alien, as though they did not belong here.

There was a shout from the wharf coolies; they threw out the great knots of woven rope and the lighter ground itself against the pier. The gangplank was lowered and he waited and the next minute he felt Mary's warm arms.

"You're looking well, Jim," Mary said breathlessly. "A little thin, maybe."

"Say, Shanghai is some place," Peter said.

Only Louise said nothing, and James saw that she was very much thinner indeed and that she looked as though she had been crying.

He had hired a carriage whose cushions had been newly covered with khaki and whose horse was something less starved than others. It seemed even a little cozy inside, especially when the big oilcloth apron smelling of tung oil had been fastened to hooks in the umbrella top and the horse trotted away from the pier.

"Well," James said, smiling on them all, "this is nice."

They smiled at him a little wanly, he thought.

"Louise was seasick," Mary said.

"So were you," Peter said.

"Not much, really," Mary retorted. "You are too proud of yourself, Peter."

The long sea voyage had worn down their tempers a little. "I wish I could have ordered a good day for you," James said, trying to be cheerful. Still, he told himself, it was as well to go through the streets behind this oilcloth curtain. Chinese people seemed always unprotected against rain and snow, and the bund lasted for so short a distance. Too soon the streets became crowded and disheveled.

The hotel entrance was pleasant and a smart doorman received them. The lobby was warm and lined with palms, and sheltered at least from the weather. It was not too different from what they were used to, James thought. Upstairs the rooms were clean. He had taken two, one for himself and Peter and one for the girls, with a connecting bath.

The reasonable man adapts himself to the world; the unreasonable one persists in trying to adapt the world to himself. Therefore all progress depends on the unreasonable man. —GEORGE BERNARD SHAW.

"What measly towels!" Louise said when she looked in.

"I believe they are made in the factories here," James said.

"Why is it we can't do anything as well as other people?"

"Now, Louise," Mary said, "don't begin by being disgusted with everything."

"We'd better get some food," James said. "Then we can go to a movie this afternoon. That sounds like New York, doesn't it? Let's get ready."

He wanted very much an hour alone with Mary, but he knew that there would be no chance for this. In his room with Peter he did not know whether to ask questions or not.

"It's a great surprise, all this," he said. "Ma's letter didn't make anything very plain, either."

"It's a big fuss about nothing, if you ask me," Peter grunted. "Louise made pa angry. I never thought he really meant to ship us off, though. He threatens so many things he never does. But he went himself and bought the tickets and he wouldn't pay for any tuition for us. I want to turn right around and go back, of course. I'm still going to be an engineer."

James smiled. "Better stay a few months anyway, now you're here," he said. "I've fixed up rather a nice house in Peking for us all. It's a fine old city—makes you proud."

"Is it better than Shanghai?"

"I think so, anyway." James returned to the effort. "So you don't know really what Louise did?"

"Oh, I know," Peter said. "She's in love with Philip Morgan, and Phil doesn't want to marry anybody now. When he does he will probably marry some debutante."

James could not speak, watching this brother of his. Peter was utterly and completely foreign. He had nothing to help him here, no shred of knowledge to help him endure being Chinese. For it would be a matter of endurance. Peter had never absorbed either atmosphere or ideas from their father, and now James realized that the atmosphere of ancient Chinese philosophy which his father had so persistently built around them had helped him and Mary. Even after they understood its artificiality, and then perhaps its uselessness in these swift modern times, it had become a part of them. But Peter and Louise had come to despise it, and they were never deceived for an instant by its unreality.

"So Louise was sent here to get over a love affair."

"Something like that," Peter said briskly. He got up, bored by Louise. "Jim, if I stay for this autumn will you promise to make pa let me go home in time for midyears?"

"If you won't call it home," James replied. "This is home, you know."

"Oh, well—you know what I mean."

Long ago Mrs. Liang had learned not to open envelopes addressed to her husband. Therefore she did not open the yellow envelope which she hoped brought news of the children's safe arrival. It came after luncheon when he was taking a nap in his study, and she tiptoed to the door and listened. She could hear him breathing heavily, and she sighed and went back to the living room and sat down by the window OUTSIDE in the park the leaves were beginning to fall, and this meant that winter would soon come. In Peking, the days were always sunny. Even when there came down a snowstorm from the north, it passed quickly. And how the bright red berries of Indian bamboo used to shine through the whiteness. She wiped her eyes quietly. When the winds blew here the tall building trembled and she was always afraid, although Liang grew so angry with her. Liang was often angry with her, and for many things she did not blame him.

He is not very happy here, too, she thought. No one is happy away from the earth and waters of his own home.

Suddenly she heard him cough. She ran to the door again and opened it softly. He was awake, but he looked unwell and pale. "Liang, here is an electric letter from the children."

"Give it to me," he said.

She stood waiting while he tore open the envelope with his thumbnail and took out the inner sheet.

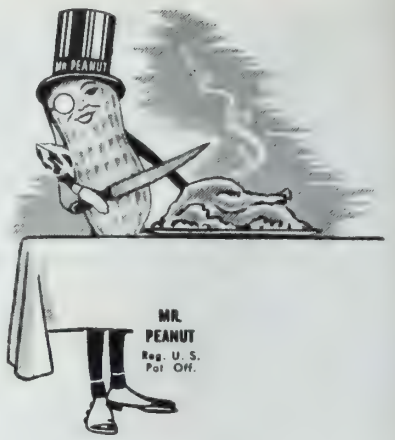
"They have arrived safely and they are well."

A misty happiness filled her body. "So they are safe."

"Of course," he said. He stooped and pulled on his slippers. "You are always so fearful."

She understood that his nap had left him feeling heavy and uncomfortable, and so she said, "I will fetch you some hot tea and then it will be good for you to take a short walk in the park. You have to make a talk tonight before American ladies."

"I don't see why I am always compelled to make these talks."



She hastened to agree with him. "Nor do I, Liang. How can women understand the things you talk about?"

She hoped to comfort him, but instead she made him very angry. "Not all women are like you," he said coldly. "There are even some women who appreciate the subject to which I have devoted my life."

"I am always wrong." She turned and went away to the kitchen. Had the children been here she would have answered him with some temper of her own, but a woman without children had no courage before a man.

In his own way Doctor Liang was suffering. He could not understand why his usual buoyancy had left him and why he felt dry and sad. He had done a great deal of work since the children went and made entirely new notes for his course in contemporary Chinese literature. The children's mother was of course somewhat depressed. That was inevitable. She was the mother type rather than the wife type. He had come to this conclusion long ago.

In his own way Doctor Liang thought a great deal about women. No woman could have persuaded him from the path of rectitude, and he was a man genuinely chaste. Nevertheless, he analyzed many women in his mind. There was, for example, Violet Sung. Beautiful in the most truly exotic fashion, cultivated, even learned, Violet had come from Paris a few months ago to take New York by storm. She was besieged by suitors of every nationality, and she would marry none of them. The rumor now, however, was that she had accepted the love of a handsome middle-aged Englishman whose business interests kept him half the year in New York.

Doctor Liang was inclined to believe the rumor if only because of the bitter gossip raging among the Chinese. Chinese men were especially bitter, as if they felt that Violet had rejected each of them individually when she accepted an Englishman. Doctor Liang had philosophy enough to enjoy this jealousy and to acknowledge half humorously that he had some of it himself. He would have been thoroughly alarmed had Violet pursued him, but he enjoyed the deference which she had always shown him in public, and before others he indulged in a little domineering flirtation.

Violet Sung made a very interesting type for a philosopher to study. Someday he might work up a lecture on the difference between the mother type and the Violet type, and whether a man should have both in his life. In old-fashioned China, of course, all had been well arranged. The first wife was the mother. Thereafter a man took as concubine the other type. But this apparently offended the newer civilization of the Americans, who were not so naturalistic. A formula here had yet to be found.

At this moment Doctor Liang felt the need of an audience. He rose and went rather impetuously into the living room. "Eh," he said to Mrs. Liang. "I want to talk to you." He sat down on the chair opposite her, and linked together loosely his large, exquisitely shaped hands. "I want to ask you a question as a good mother," he said. "Do you prefer the western way of having concubines outside the family in secret or our old-fashioned way of bringing them into the family and allowing all children to be born under one roof?"

Mrs. Liang was smitten with fear. Was he thinking of taking a concubine? Her lips went dry and she stared at him. "What thoughts have you?"

But he did not see her fear. "I want to know what you think."

She collected her terrified thoughts. "Of course our way is better," she faltered. "Why should children suffer for what their father does?"

Her heart yearned over her own. . . . Of course if Liang wanted another woman he must bring her into this house. It would be shameful for him to descend to the sort of thing that foreigners did. Yet could she endure another woman here? No! She would go to her children. She was about to rise with dignity from her chair and tell Liang this.

He gave her no time either to rise or to speak. Instead he himself rose briskly. "Thank you," he said with unusual courtesy. "I wanted to know what you would think—the mother type ——"

He hastened back to his study and closed the door firmly and at once sat down and began to write fluently at his desk. He wrote for two hours, and when he came out Mrs. Liang had his supper on the table. He ate it with enjoyment, although he missed the tinge of garlic with which she would have seasoned the food had he not been going out that night. American ladies disliked the odor, and he could not sufficiently protect

NEW LA FRANCE BRIGHTENS COLORS, TOO

When you wash with new La France with Luminess, deep greens and reds and browns become richer. Yellows and blues achieve more brightness. Wash dresses that have grown drab in many washings suddenly become crisper in color, new-looking. It's the Luminess that does it...that amazing Luminess!

What a wonderful discovery for women who have become resigned to bluings that dull colors or to bleaches that tend to bleed all brightness out of garments. Try new La France yourself... but be prepared to be amazed!

With new La France, you don't need to worry about washing fast-color and white things separately. New La France will whiten the white things and brighten the colored things in the same washer-load or tubful simultaneously.

New La France provided by Bendix in new washers!

Enthusiastic Comments from Users of the New La France

Amazing New Whitening Compound Actually Adds Whiteness to Clothes

Also increases brightness of every color in the rainbow

By FRANCES BARTON

Hoboken, New Jersey, Nov. 1948—Out of the laboratory has finally come a new answer to an old question! "How can I wash white clothes so that they will look whiter?"

For many years it has been the custom to bleach or to blue clothes to make them appear whiter. Now, a new compound has been developed by a group of chemists which outmodes all regular bluings as surely as the electric iron outmodes the iron your grandmother heated on the stove.

So new is this compound that its remarkable action is as impressive to many chemists and physicists as to housewives.

This compound is called Luminess, and it is now being used in the new La France bluing flakes.

All white clothes are white because they reflect light . . . colored clothes are bright because they reflect light. The more light they reflect, the whiter and brighter they are.

This wonderful new substance, Luminess, makes them reflect more light than they do naturally, thereby making them whiter and brighter than ever before.

Gets Clothes Whiter!

If you wash your white and colored things (clothes, tablecloths, anything) with your regular soap or detergent and with new La France containing Luminess, you find they don't grow dingier and grayer as time goes on. They actually grow whiter... keep right on getting more so each time you wash!

After half a dozen washings, clothes are just as white, or whiter than they were when you bought them at the store. This is true no matter what brand of soap or detergent you use.

La France is simple to use. It comes in the form of a bluing flake. You simply add it to the wash water along with your soap or detergent. No bother. It works automatically while you wash. It works so well that the makers of the Bendix Automatic Washing Machine include a package of new La France in every washer they sell!

SAFER THAN ANY BLEACH!

Until new La France was developed no other product could begin to do anywhere near the whitening job that bleaches do. Now La France with Luminess will do a miraculous whitening job, and do it safely.

Besides being such a good whitener La France has a great advantage over bleaches. Any bit of washes, be it silk, cotton, rayon, linen or nylon, will never be weakened by La France. But, remember, La France is a whitener and brightener, not a stain remover. If you have a stubborn spot or stain, you'll need a bleach.

In fact, when you put new La France in with your soap or detergent, shirts, sheets, towels and other white washables come out whiter than they do when you put a bleach in with the suds.

La France works wonders because it actually adds whiteness to the material, whiteness that stays in it.

Why don't you try one-quarter package of new La France next time you wash?

BETTER THAN ANY BLUING

We had La France tested by many housewives who were users of old-fashioned liquid ball or cube bluing. These women were used to taking great precaution against streaking, spotting and over-bluing.

They found there was no need for such precautions with new La France. La France goes right in with the soap; the simple motion of the clothes through the water dissolves La France completely. It can't possibly spot or streak.

Because La France with Luminess actually adds whiteness to your white clothes, there's never a trace of blue on anything washed with La France. And don't forget, it brightens colors, too!

saw. Peter and his sisters were sitting in the large central court under the light of three paper lanterns which young Wang had strung to the great pine tree. Little Dog had brought out a teapot and some chairs, and Wang was squatting on his heels playing a flute. It was just as he would have liked Chen to see them. He introduced them quickly.

Little Dog ran to fetch more chairs and his mother fetched bowls and some small cakes and a dish of watermelon seeds, and young Wang, retiring behind the pine tree, continued to play softly his gently winding airs. It was very pleasant. In a little while they were all gay, for Chen revealed that he knew sleight of hand.

"I had an uncle who was a traveling juggler," he confessed. "My uncle would not work, and since he had long thin hands without any bones, my grandfather feared he might become a pickpocket and disgrace an honest family. So he apprenticed him to a juggler."

They all watched Liu Chen and laughed continually at what he could do. He took bowls of water out of the air and he swallowed lighted cigarettes and made Louise's earrings disappear.

"I have tried to persuade Chen to come and live with us," James said.

"Oh, yes," Louise cried eagerly. "That would be fun."

"There is plenty of room," Mary said, "and we'll all live more cheaply, several together."

Chen looked about on them, a half-smile still upon his lips. "Well, well, I will think about it," he said. "Perhaps it is too soon. I have bad table manners and when I sleep I snore loudly."

The end of it was that in less than a week Chen moved into the house, taking the far-end room beyond Peter's. To Little Dog young Wang said, "Now there is somebody in the house who knows what must be done. He is no foreigner like the others."

—LOUIS TUCKER: Clerical Errors. (Harper & Brothers).

Mrs. Liang's letter reached her children only after a month. She had not understood that extra stamps were needed for air mail and so it had been carried across the ocean by an ordinary steamship, had awaited the pleasure of a clerk in the Shanghai post office who had just got himself married, and had reached the hospital in mid-autumn.

The autumn was unusually fine. There had been no high winds and therefore little dust, and the camel caravans had not yet come in for the winter to stir up the streets with their huge flopping feet. Since it was the first really peaceful year since the Japanese had withdrawn, the chrysanthemums were large and fine. Mary had gone drunk with pleasure in them. Chrysanthemum venders had learned that if they came to the gate early in the morning before she went to the hospital or late after she came back, they were sure of a sale. She had bought dozens of pots. The court was lined with them, and they stood against the walls of the house inside the rooms.

SHE was very happy. She loved the house, and she missed nothing of what she had had in New York. The privacy of the court, the shade under the great leaning pine, all was as she liked it. Especially she liked the simplicity of life. There was no machinery to vex by breaking down just when it was needed most. Little Dog's mother and Little Dog himself were excellent servants, provided one made certain of a few rules of cleanliness. Little Dog must not wash his clothes in the dishpan, and Little Dog's mother must not wash the rice bowls by running her finger around them in a pail of cold water. She explained to them earnestly about germs, and argued with Chen when he simply said everything must be eaten hot.

In the hospital, as at home, Mary was almost completely happy. That she was not altogether so was because of her sincere anger whenever one of the doctors failed to be as careful of the children under her care as she thought he should be. Upon a Saturday morning, as she was preparing to go home for the midday meal, she stopped at the hospital post office and there found her mother's letter. It was thick, and it would be full of news, and they would read it aloud at the table together.

Saturday was always a pleasant day, for they did not hurry back to the hospital and Peter had a holiday from the college. This afternoon they had planned a walk to the chrysanthemum market.

She waited for James to finish his first bowl of rice. Then she said, "Here is a letter from ma."

"Good!" James exclaimed. "I was secretly beginning to worry, for pa has not written at all, although he promised he would."

Chen rose. "I will go away," he said politely.

James pressed him down, "Sit down, sit down," he said. "Now you are our brother."

"THERE is no telling what is in ma's letters," Peter said with some mischief.

So Mary began to read. Every now and then she paused and turned the letter this way and that, for their mother's writing was entirely individual and she went by sound rather than by the correct way of shaping a character.

Upon this Peter gave some advice. "You make a mistake to examine ma's writing," he said. "Take a deep breath as though you were about to run a race, and then go as fast as you can, by sense only."

They laughed and Mary, in fun, did what Peter had told her to do. Thus she rushed straight into the part of Mrs. Liang's letter where she told of the possibility of a concubine and her determination to leave the house in such case. There Mary stopped. They looked at one another aghast. Even Louise was startled and put down her chopsticks.

"I told you I should not be here," Chen said.

"Why not?" Mary demanded. "If pa has been so foolish ——"

"I do not believe it," James said severely.

Peter turned to Louise. "You know pa better than any of us," he said. "Can you think of anyone who seemed . . . special to him?"

Louise looked thoughtful. It was painful to remember all the gaiety of those days in New York in comparison with the dullness of her present life, but she forced herself to do so. "I do think that pa used to talk more to Violet Sung than to any of the rest."

Peter groaned loudly. "Oh—that . . . female!"

"Hush!" James said. "Who is Violet Sung?"

Louise cast a sidelong look at her brother. "She is a friend of Lili's."

James compelled his face not to change. He put on his most elderly-brother look and said quietly, "I feel sure that pa will not do such a thing. Give me the letter, Mary. I will finish it in private, and then I will write to him for us all. Of course if we are wrong about pa, it is quite true that ma must come to live with us."

"Then I will go and take care of pa," Louise said eagerly. "I am sure Violet will not be a good housekeeper. She is very beautiful, in that French sort of way. And you know how pa is—he's very intellectual, but at the same time he's used to the way ma looks after him, and Violet would never put a hot-water bottle in his bed or see that his ties are cleaned and his shoes brushed." Her face lit with joy, and they all pitied her, for they knew that it was not to their father that she wished to return.

James rose and went into the other room, and Louise silently followed him. The others left behind ate what they wished of the remainder of the meal. Mary's appetite was gone, and Chen, feeling sorry for her, had not the heart to seem hungry. When she put

"If I thought pa really were so wicked, I would declare myself not his daughter," Mary said. Every day in the newspapers in Peking daughters and sons declared themselves free of their parents, because, they said, these parents were too old-fashioned and did not have the interest of the nation at heart.

"Pa is very deep," Peter said. "He is full of Confucianism and all that rotten old stuff. You should hear the fellows here at college talk about Confucius. Why, Confucius was only a reactionary. Hygiene and science are equally backward here, because Confucius has kept back our people."

"I don't see what this has to do with pa!" Mary cried.

"It has everything to do with him," Peter said. "Pa is a reactionary too. That's why he doesn't dare to come back to China. He is afraid some progressive will stab him in the back in a dark alley." Seeing the impression he had made, he went on. "I have learned a lot at the college. I never knew before how much the fellows here hate pa. I have to say only that I don't agree with him."

"You ought to be ashamed of yourself," Mary said warmly. "Your own father!"

"Yours too. It was only a minute ago that you were talking about being independent of him."

Thus caught, Mary lost her temper. "Oh, shut up!" she said in English, and feeling the tears come to her eyes, she rose and went to the court, wanting to be alone.

Chen, however, was still there. He had sat down on the bench under the great tree to pick his teeth and consider how he could be useful.

When he saw Mary he laid the toothpick in his hand and rose politely.

"Please," Chen said, "sit down for a moment. I have been thinking about the letter. My conclusion is that your mother has made some mistake. If your father were really considering such a step he could not take it in America, where a concubine is not a recognized person. Moreover, I have discovered that intellectuals seldom carry on a genuine love affair. Take the doctors in our hospital. They talk a great deal about love and women when we are alone together. Actually, for them love is theoretical. Your father is no longer young. He is the less likely then to undertake a love affair in practical terms. Please write to your mother and tell her that she is probably mistaken."

Seventy-one is a burden to himself and others—a brittle elm tree to have near you. —GEORGE MEREDITH.

MARY had listened to this somewhat long speech without removing her eyes from Chen's face. As he stood there under the pine tree with the sunlight falling through the branches, she saw as if for the first time that the look in his eyes was good, friendly and true.

"Come and sit under the pine tree," Chen said to Mary. "The air is cool and fragrant. You need not talk. Let us just sit in quietness."

Doctor Liang received his son's letter on a cool night in October. He had just come home, with Mrs. Liang, from a very enjoyable occasion. Mr. and Mrs. Li had announced the formal engagement of their daughter Lili to Charles Ting, the son of Timothy Ting, who, it was expected, would be China's next ambassador to the Court of St. James's. It had been a distinguished party. The great wealth of the Li family was joined to the high position of the Ting family, and the Waldorf-Astoria had done its best. The food was superb, the best of Chinese and American, and champagne and the finest teas were served.

Doctor Liang had reached the party with carefully timed lateness and immediately he was surrounded by people. Mrs. Liang drifted away with her usual quiet and found herself a comfortable chair and sat down. She gazed at the crowd of people around him and her eyes were caught by the figure of a beautiful Chinese woman who had something foreign about her. She wore a tight, perfectly fitting robe of deep violet velvet, with pearls at her throat and in her ears. Her high-heeled slippers and handbag were gold. She sauntered near Doctor Liang and in a moment or two they had clasped hands. Mrs. Liang instantly felt that this was the woman who had made him think of concubines. She leaned toward another stout, middle-aged Chinese lady who sat silent a few feet away.

"Who is the woman in the velvet robe?"

The Chinese lady looked toward Doctor Liang. "That is Miss Violet Sung."

"I never saw her before," Mrs. Liang said.

"She is from Paris," the lady replied. "She is said to be very clever. It is also said that she is the mistress of that Englishman."

WITH her little finger the lady pointed toward a tall, grave-looking foreigner who was smoking his pipe and smiling at a small, earnest-looking American woman whose gown was slipping from her shoulders.

Mrs. Liang looked at them vaguely. "How do these western women keep their dresses from falling off?"

"I have often wondered, but I do not know one of them well enough to ask such a question."

"Standing above her like that," Mrs. Liang went on, "that Englishman must be able to observe her bosom."

"Doubtless," the lady agreed.

They fell into silence and Mrs. Liang's eyes returned to her husband and Miss Violet Sung. She felt better now that she knew Miss Sung was already attached to a man, but still she disliked her. Also she knew her own old man. He would play about a woman with renewed zeal when he knew she was attached to another man.

She decided that the time had come for her to be active, and so she rose and walked rather stiffly to where Doctor Liang stood talking to Miss Violet Sung. "Eh, Liang!" Mrs. Liang said in Chinese. "I begin to grow hungry."

His face, so lighted with happiness a moment before, grew suddenly cold. "Ah, yes, yes," he said.

Mrs. Liang stared at Violet Sung, then she put out her plump hand. "How do you do, Miss Violet Sung," she said in English. "I have heard your name. I am Mrs. Liang, and this is my husband."

Violet Sung's slim hand touched hers. "Oh, how do you do, Mrs. Liang—we were just going to get something to eat."

"Come with us," Mrs. Liang said. "There is food enough for everybody."

"Thank you." Violet Sung had a sweet, deep voice. "But please excuse me." She smiled and slipped away, and they saw her join the Englishman and go toward the dining room.

Mrs. Liang stood stolidly beside Doctor Liang. "She is mistress to that Englishman."

"Please don't speak so loudly," Doctor Liang replied, with too much politeness.

As the evening proceeded, Mrs. Liang found two old friends whom she had known in China, and the three ladies sat in a quiet corner and told one another of their difficulties with white servants and the thieveries of American grocery clerks with short-weight scales. All the ladies had children and Mrs. Liang confided that her eldest son James, the most brilliant student ever to have graduated from his medical college here in New York, and now in Peking, where he was to be the head of the hospital next year, had once thought himself in love with Lili Li. However, he soon saw that while Lili was very pretty, she was also spoiled and selfish, and not at all the wife for a man who would one day be famous.

"It is difficult indeed, to be the wife of a famous man," Mrs. Liang sighed. "For example, my husband—what he will eat and what he won't eat, the sort of undershirts he will wear and he won't wear, the hours when

You can make over your Living Room with a new rug and a plan ...thanks to Alexander Smith

Mrs. Bernard Daxon, of Kearney, Nebraska, tells how the Daxons made an old room new—with an Alexander Smith Rug, and a decorating plan from Clara Dudley, your color-scheme consultant at Alexander Smith.

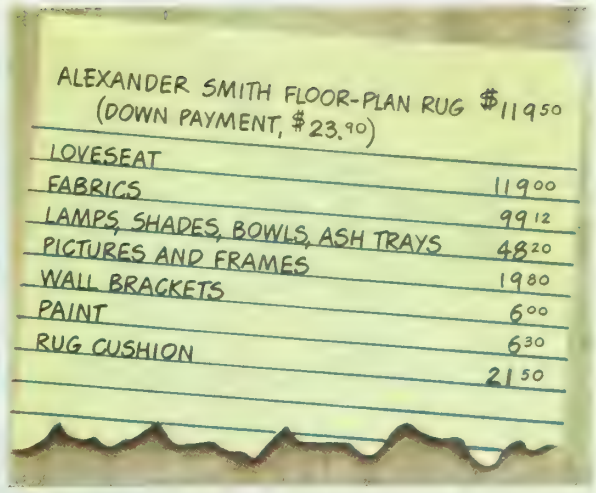
I'd taken our living room for granted, with its aged rug and artless color scheme, until Kathryn grew up to her first formal dress. But a fifteen-year-old girl looks at things with fresh, seeing eyes. And when Dax, my husband, and I took a really good look at the room we live in most, we decided Kathryn's fifteen-year-old eyes saw right. The room was more homely than homelike.

The old rug in the living room deserved a pension. Kathryn offered to help buy a new one with money she earned detasseling corn last Summer. Naturally, Dax and I wouldn't let her. But we figured out what we could afford to pay for a nice, new rug, and then went to see Harold Swan, our furniture dealer here in Kearney.

We chose a Floor-Plan Rug from Alexander Smith—one of those wonderful broadloom rugs, ready-made in room sizes. Ours is 9′ x 13′6″—$119.50, or $23.90 down and the balance monthly, if we wanted terms. Mr. Swan told me that Clara Dudley, Alexander Smith's color-scheme consultant, would work out a decorating plan just for us. He gave me her Workshop Questionnaire. I filled it out that very day and mailed it to her.

COPYRIGHT 1948, ALEXANDER SMITH & SONS CARPET COMPANY

Clara Dudley worked out our color-scheme starting from the rose-and-pink rug we'd bought to go with our pink walls. She sent me fabric and paint samples... even a room-plan for our furniture. Then we all rolled up our sleeves and got down to work.



Grandma Daxon, Jimmie's best friend and sincerest admirer, looked on while Jimmie unpacked the loveseat—our only new piece of furniture. Grandma homesteaded in the Nebraska sandhills back in 1906. Pretty things mean a lot to her.

The most fun was the window. Dax is an engi-
:er, and Gerry, my 12-year-old, can do anything.
Between them they managed this chintz-covered ame. Clara Dudley suggested we paint this one all blue-grey, to make the room seem larger.

Gerry and Jimmie helped Kathryn roll out the rug. Isn't it amazing—the difference a good rug makes in a room, from the moment it's down! You can feel the improvement. As Kathryn solemnly assures us, "A rug is the base of a room's decoration."

We could have frittered away, so easily, the money we've invested in our home. But we're so glad we have something substantial to show for our money —something we can all enjoy. We can't imagine, now how we could have lived in that old room so long.

Our beautiful new room means more to Kathryn, I think, than her first real date did—corsage and all. How she loves to bring her friends home, now. Our Alexander Smith Rug, of course, is a beauty. And Clara Dudley's plan for us is exactly what we'd have dreamed up ourselves, if we'd just known how. Jimmie says, and we all agree, "We're the luckiest family in Nebraska."

Let Clara Dudley help you, too. Go to your favorite store. Buy your Alexander Smith Rug. Ask for Clara Dudley's Workshop Questionnaire. Fill it out and send it in for a decorating plan worked out just for you. Or, for Clara Dudley's new, FREE color-idea book, "Colorama," write Alexander Smith & Sons Carpet Company, 285 Fifth Avenue, New York 16, New York.

he cannot be disturbed and the hours when he must be amused."

The two listening ladies looked at Doctor Liang, who was now talking with the Englishman. Violet Sung was not near either of them. She was dancing with a young Frenchman, and so beautifully that people were standing about to watch.

"I don't think you could expect the return of Hong Kong," the Englishman was saying to Doctor Liang. "We're rather more responsible than before for the peace of the East, especially with Russia kicking about there in Manchuria. And there are your own communists, my dear sir. What are you going to do about them?"

Doctor Liang smiled gracefully. "I'm a mere man of letters," he said softly. "I don't occupy my mind with such things."

"Ah yes, well," Ranald Grahame said. "Somebody has to, you know."

His eyes wandered about the room and fell on Violet, dancing with that chap Pierre du Bois. He watched them in silence, so suddenly grave that Doctor Liang, with his delicate intuition, felt alarmed. He would not like that look directed against him! Thus thinking, he said that he must be going home, and then he drifted across the room, and found Mrs. Liang.

Doctor and Mrs. Liang rode home in total silence and Mrs. Liang leaned her head in a corner of the taxi and dozed. When they got home they found the letter from James.

"It is from the children," Mrs. Liang cried with pleasure. "Come, let us read it at once."

"I would like a cup of hot tea," Doctor Liang said. "While you make it I will just cast my eyes over the letter."

She looked wistful, but being anxious to keep him in good humor, she went obediently to the kitchen and set the kettle on to boil. She waited until the kettle boiled and she had infused the tea. Then with teapot and two bowls she went to the study.

What she saw caused her to set the teapot down hastily on the table. "Liang, what is wrong?"

He was tearing the letter into small pieces. "So," he said, between set teeth, "you think I am about to take a concubine!"

She turned pale and sat down. "I did think so," she faltered, "and I told the children I could not stay here if you did."

"And whom would I take as a concubine?"

"I didn't know," she said, still faltering. "But one day you came and asked me what I thought about concubines ——"

"Fool!" he said bitterly. "I was only writing an essay about women."

She looked at him confounded. "Was that all?"

"That was all."

She turned and tried to pour a bowl of tea, but her hand shook and she gave it up. "You will have to pour your own tea," she said, beginning to sob.

She made for the door blindly, her handkerchief to her eyes, but he stopped her. "Have I ever been unfaithful to you?"

She shook her head, her eyes still hidden behind her handkerchief. "Not altogether."

"What do you mean not altogether?" he demanded. "Either one is or is not unfaithful."

She was very tired. She was so tired that she felt reckless and inclined to tell the truth, even though the children were not here to protect her.

"What is this faithful and unfaithful? It is all in the eyes and the mind. Do you think I do not know the look in your eyes and on your mouth when you are being faithful with me? And when I see the same look when you look at that Violet Sung and—and any other such woman, do I not know what you are being? You are not a man with a single kind of mind in you. You are like this"—Mrs. Liang's fingers described in the air contradictory and secret convolutions—"winding this way and that way and this way. I know you!"

Upon this she burst into loud sobs and rushed out the door. Tomorrow morning, she told herself, she would empty the wastebasket herself in the kitchen and collect the scraps and piece together the children's letter.

Doctor Liang got up and poured himself tea and drank it slowly. When this was done he took out his Confucian classics and began to read them. The book fell open of itself at the pages upon which Confucius, more than two thousand years ago, had recited his hatreds. Smug people Confucius hated, rumormongers he hated, spies he hated, and wily persons who pretended to be honest gentlemen. He hated the color purple because it put to confusion the good color of red, and he hated prigs because they confused themselves with virtuous people. Then Confucius ended the list of his hatreds with these words: "Women and uneducated people are the most difficult to deal with. When I am familiar with them they become impudent, and when I ignore them, they resent it."

Doctor Liang read these words thoughtfully, drank a little more tea and prepared himself to sleep all night upon the couch here in his study. He felt lonely. That was the worst of going to an evening party. One was deceived by the noise, the glitter, the appearance of friends. Then home seemed cold and empty.

Perhaps he had been hasty about sending the children away. Or perhaps, indeed, he and their mother should now think about returning to China. A pleasant house in Peking with a garden, his children there, he and the mother growing old, honored and respected as only in China are the old honored and respected! Perhaps he might even be the president of a university, since he did not want to go into politics. He was on the brink of going upstairs to find his wife and to tell her impulsively that at last he was about to yield to her wishes. He hesitated, however. It was his habit never to allow himself to appear reconciled in less than twenty-four hours. He put out his hand to turn on the radio, since he could not sleep, and at the same moment the last news commentator was finishing his summary of the world's news for the day:

"In Peking the day was marked by stormy protest from the students. Five thousand university students went on strike against the arrest of twenty-five of their fellows who have been in jail since yesterday for ——"

He winced and turned off the radio. A scholar must have peace. Resolutely he closed his eyes and in a slow murmuring voice he began to recite the Book of Songs, written hundreds of centuries ago. It was better than a bromide, and in less than a quarter of an hour he was fast asleep.

Still later did Ranald Grahame sit up talking to Violet. They did not so much share one apartment as live in connecting ones. He was not the sort of man who wanted domesticity, and certainly she was not the woman to provide it. He had explained that to Violet so there would be no misunderstanding. He believed in being as honest with women as he was with men.

This honesty compelled him now to demand an explanation of her behavior. He had left the party early because he would not allow himself to make a spectacle be-

But she was not a spy, nor anything indeed cept what she seemed to be, a rootless, autiful woman, floating on any surface, d without depths of her own into which to tire. Her father had been an old-fashioned hinese, whose origins even she did not her family, she had traveled with her servnts, a married French couple who made her home wherever she was. Until she met the nglishman she had had only one lover, a otheaded, jealous Brazilian who had made

"I quite realize that you and I have no claim on each other," Ranald was saying, "and I make no claim now." He was very straight and tall and his pale, firm face was distinguished-looking. "Nevertheless, I cannot have it said that you allow yourself to be exhibited by a Frenchman or any other man. I demand of my mistress the same good taste which I might demand of my wife, if I had one."

"You needn't say that to me, Ranald. All my Chinese common sense tells me that I shall never find as good a man as you. There are times when you seem a little dull to me, you know, and then Pierre or somebody like him is fun—just for an hour or so. But if you don't like it, I can easily do without fun. I'd much rather be able to count on you and have you count on me."

He acknowledged to himself that her honesty was equal to his. "Thank you, my dear," he said with some heartiness and entire sincerity. "So long as we understand each other! All the same, I'd advise not dancing too long with one man or sitting too long, for that matter. You went to that extreme with Doctor Liang the last time. I didn't say anything, for I felt you couldn't be interested in him—a wishy-washy sort of man, I thought."

"Distinguished," she murmured in her Chinese way. "With us a man does not have to be brutal or strong. Delicacy is also appreciated. Subtlety is admired."

He was not without his own subtleties. "You are more French than Chinese under that smooth golden skin of yours," he remarked.

She laughed. "That is exactly what is the matter with me."

He allowed himself a smile. He was really very fond of her. She knew how to be comfortable as well as passionate. The combination was irresistible.

A WEEK END IS NOT ENOUGH

erious and she knew it was the real thing, but ometimes she was baffled by the knowledge
Vic had that she did not possess, the experince that lay in his years, and the easy assurnce with which he took things in stride; but t the same time she was flattered that a man ke him should be charmed by her.

"What shall we do?" she said eagerly.

"Let's drive somewhere this week end," he said impulsively. "Get out in the country where we can breathe."

She felt as if he were handing her the challenge of his experience, asking her to partake of it, yet she was not sure of what it consisted.

"Wouldn't you like to?" he asked when she did not answer at once. "Get away from everything, get off somewhere where we don't know anyone. It would be fun."

She looked up at him; he was watching her closely, she tried to see what he meant, but such a warmth of feeling spread through her at his nearness that she pushed the disturbing implication aside. She murmured quickly, "It would be fun," and after that she wanted to go if only to be with him.

There had been only one moment that had unsettled her since they started, and it had belonged entirely to her. They had been driving for some two hours when Vic spied the sign of the Golden Horn Inn on the edge of a quiet town. He slowed the car, brought it to a stop beside the rambling white frame building trimmed in red. There was a small front yard and a garden to one side spreading toward the back, clumps of purple aster were drying on their stalks in the yard and a last wisp of goldenrod glowed in the sun. Two enormous lacy elms, turned yellow, protected the inn from the street.

"Like it?" Vic asked as if he had chosen the place beforehand.

Lucy had glanced at him questioningly. The very finding of the place was to be part of the adventure.

"I remember coming through here once and seeing it," he said, as if realizing her unspoken question. "I always thought I'd like to come back and try it. I hoped it would still be here, that I wasn't mistaken, that it wasn't some other town."

It was all right then. She liked the inn. It was just the sort of place she had hoped they would find. Vic left her in the car and went in to see about rooms. When he came back she saw at once that he had not been successful.

"Only one room."

He hesitated on the curb, and something inside of her began to rush madly so that she felt the color of it flushing into her face. It was this moment she had wondered about from the very time he had suggested the trip. Would it be? And here it was. Vic was standing there on the curb as if he hoped she would say one room would do. She folded her hands together tightly in her lap.

"Too bad," she managed. "It's such a lovely place too."

She saw by his face that she had disappointed him in some way, as though he felt she did not trust him. It was not so. It was something else, something she could not explain either to him or to herself. She could not have given a reason for turning him down.

He started round to get into the car when he saw the desk clerk on the porch motioning to him. He went over and up the steps. Lucy, watching them, wondered if she hadn't taken a role she was not cut out for, if she had accepted a part she didn't really want to play. Or was it that she didn't know how to play it? Vic came running back to the car, happy in, smiling broadly. The clerk had recon-ered; if they could wait around until eight clock there would be another checkout on same floor. Vic patted her shoulder as if to ssure her timidity. She felt grateful to him having settled the thing so easily.

They left the bags in the car and went in dinner. The fire burning at the far end of dining room spiced the air with the sharp, eet scent of pine. The paneled walls wed with the rays of the western sun com-through the curtained windows, the old od shone, and the wide, bare boards of the or were polished like glass. There were not many people. The coziness of the room gan at once to envelop them and every-ing else was shut away.

The waiter brought the steaming onion up in blue bowls. Vic took up his spoon.

"That clerk certainly fell for my story," said over the steaming soup.

She glanced up. "What story?"

"I told him we were driving to New York, at we were too tired to go on tonight."

"Oh." Slowly she took up a spoonful of up. It was delicious. There was nothing ong with it, it was her favorite soup. Yet a oment after she swallowed the spoonful ere was a faint turning of the flavor in her outh, as if there were not enough of some gredient. "What will you tell him tomor-w when we stay?"

He laughed. "That we like the place. We ave a right to change our minds, haven't e?"

"Yes," she said, and let it pass. But it did ot pass; it began to linger and the really ex-llent onion soup could not drown it be-ause of the lack of one ngredient.

Vic pushed aside the mpty blue bowl. "That as a good starter. Do you now, I'm hungry, honey."

How very good-looking e was when he was leased, Lucy thought. His rm mouth became tender, the sharp edges of is face softened, his eyes darkened, became arm. She sat completely taken in by him, onscious at the same time of his confidence, s if life were on his side and he had nothing o worry about. It was a trait in him that ad readily appealed to her. So many little hings bothered her, as though she had et arrived on the highway. With Vic she valked with more reliable steps; his confi-lence was contagious and she caught it each ime she was with him as though she had ever known it before.

She looked back out the window. The sun vas gone, only a dull red light fanned up be-hind the trees, the day was slowly being blotted out. The trees were dark clumps against the sky now, the grass was a leaden sheet, night was coming on with no pleasant lingering of summer twilight.

"You know, Lucy ——" Vic began, paused.

SHE moved her head and saw that he was watching her. She met his eyes and was swept up into his look. She could not look at him any more without being completely drawn out of herself. It was not fair, that he could take her so easily away from herself. And yet she saw that she was affecting him in very much the same way.

"What is it?" she asked.

"I'd like to wager," he said, the intense feeling ebbing away from them, "that this is the first time you've gone away like this."
